Mr. Chairman, having disposed of the various preliminary propositions, a free discussion of which was indispensable to the full investigation of the great measure embodied in this bill, I proceed to an analyzation of its principles and its details. I propose to do this in a calm and dispassionate manner, uninfluenced by party consideration. The measure is one of vital magnitude; it is too important to be dealt with for political effect; it is too serious in its nature; no patriot would use it for political capital; it is too solemn to be trifled with; it embraces every interest of Government and people; it is all-pervading; it comes home to the rich as well as the poor; it enters the dwellings of every citizen, of every grade and every condition: it is, without doubt, a subject fit for animated appeals to the hopes and fears of every patriot. But, sir, the measure comes before Congress recommended by the President, under the name, and in the guise of "reason and argument," asking free and calm discussion. I am disposed to meet it, and try it, by the standard to which the President appeals; I shall endeavor to examine the reasons and arguments of the President, of his Secretary, and its principal advocates in this and the other branch of Congress. I mean to consider the measure as defined by the President and his friends. To take the facts as they state them, unless in the same message, or some other message or State paper, or speech, they contradict them; or unless they stand contradicted by indisputable political history, and add no facts, except such as are well supported by statistics, or such as are incontestable, from admissions of leading supporters of this measure, and then ask the impartial judgment of the committee and of the country upon my exposition of the scheme, and the motives which dictate and urge its passage. As I have already remarked, I am not one of those who predict a volley of evils to come upon the country instantly upon the passage of this bill. Very far from it. God forbid that such should be its effect. The cup of human suffering is now full and overflowing. I should not be surprised if its passage produced slight temporary relief. There will be the limitation of law, to some extent, upon the unrestrained and unrestricted discretion of the Executive, as now exercised, and has been since the bank suspension in May, '37. To legalize the scheme would give temporary stability and partial security. But, sir, the practical operation of the measure, with all its power for good, and I trust for evil, is now upon the country, and has been for the last three years. This proposition I have established. Its evil effects are already realized. The whole country feels them. The whole country, at last, thank God, sees them. The practical operation of this measure is manifest in the bankrupt condition of the country, in the all pervading, universal suffering condition of the people in every department of business. No argument in this House, or out of it, can refute it—none is necessary to sustain it—every breeze that reaches us from every quarter speaks to us in the language of truth, soberness, and bitterness, of the ravages of the practical operation of this measure.

Why, then, do I oppose the passage of this bill? Not from any party motive. No, sir, no. Had I the choice of weapons to give the death blow to this Administration, I would select this very Sub-Treasury, notwithstanding the confidence of a distinguished supporter of the bill,* expressed in this language: "If my political existence depended upon it, I would rather have the success of the passage of the Sub-Treasury identified with the re-election of Mr. Van Buren than any other argument which can be used in his favor." I have said I will not discuss the Presidential question, and I will not. I simply predict, without any pretension to the gift of prophecy, that this Sub-Treasury bill will be the political winding sheet of Mr. Van Buren, of the honorable Senator, and of all others engaged in its consummation. Were I governed by party considerations, reckless of consequences to the country, I would not lift an arm to oppose its progress, or raise my voice to delay its passage for one moment, so clear are my convictions that suicidal it must be to its authors. The question still recurs, why oppose, then, the passage of this bill? I answer, because by the enactment we give the official sanction of the nation to a scheme of despotism in the solemn form of a statute, laying a precedent for future Executive encroachments and usurpations. I answer again, because it will enable the President, by the exercise of the veto power, aided by a subservient Senate, holding office for a term of six years, to fasten the measure upon the country for years, "in despite of the lamentations" of the people, to be used to force them into a compliance by the abuse of Executive patronage, or coerce them into an acquiescence of the measure, with its Treasury bank appendage, with the hope of relief from insupportable suffering. With this explanation, I proceed to the consideration of the measure contained in the bill upon your table, its principles, its details, as they appear upon its face, with the exposition of its author and friends. And first, its definition. What is the Sub-Teeasury, alias the Innependent Treasury, this great measure of safety and deliverance" to the people, as defined by the President† It consists simply of two features, it is composed of two fundamental principles; all else of the vast and ponderous bill is detail, much of it flimsy detail, unmeaning bombast, school-boy fustian, a mere jingle of words, not of hard money. Two principles of the bill, or professed principles, are these: 1st, The requirement of the Government receipts exclusively in gold or silver: 2d, The collection, preservation and disbursement of the public moneys exclusively by executive officers. This is all of the scheme as explained by the President and the leading advocates of this bill. These two principles are purely financial, applicable to the management of the Treasury, in aid of the Government and the Government only. Were there no other objection to this measure, its total inadequacy to the exigency ought to condemn it, the disease boundless, the remedy narrow and contracted. Never did the wisdom and folly of man propose a remedy so inadequate, so totally incommensurate. Never was there so little sagacity manifested in the selection of the time for the adoption of such a measure, did it possess every attribute of intrinsic merit, claimed in its behalf. Now, surely, is not the time for its application; one half of the banks suspended, the other half in a state of torpor; the exchanges ruinously deranged; circulation cramped, contracted almost to absolute collapse; the country depleted, until the people cannot have it said they live; they simply breathe upon the mutilated relics of former days. The country needs and demands stimulants, instead of more "blood letting and hot water." This is a remedy for a state of plethora, not of exhaustion; of exuberant vigor, not of debility; for high and scorching fever, not shakes and chills; such as now afflict this unhappy land, from extremity to extremity, and from centre to circumference.

Another general objection I make to this measures, it comes recommended by unsuccessful physicians, experimental political empirics. Too long already have they had the people in the crucible of their political alchymy. What better assurance have we or the country for the beneficial effects and success of this so much lauded measure, than was given by the same authors in favor of the State banks. Unbounded confidence was asserted, (whether entertained, I will not say,) in behalf of that measure, now acknowledged a total failure, and wonder even expressed by its quondam advocates that they ever should have confided in so foolish a project. And yet, with so recent a political discomfiture, these very rulers, with an impudence and an effrontery that defies a parallel, demand of the country unshaken faith in their skill and judgment, and ask the acceptance and adoption of a remedy admitted to be an "untried expedient." What sober minded man would employ a physician, under such circumstances, in sickness? none. By fair analogy, what prudent man ought any longer to entrust his dearest rights to such political quacks? None but the wilfully blind will. I now proceed to a critical analysis and dissection of this measure. The first quality that strikes the attention and challenges the admiration of the President for the Sub Treasury is its simplicity; it dispenses with much of the cumbrous and unnecessary interference of checks and counter checks, heretofore deemed indispensably important, by the most sagacious statesmen, to the safety of the public treasure. The second attribute that receives his unqualified and enthusiastic approbation, is its unity; it repudiates the idea, long entertained by the wisest and most profound statesmen, that true and genuine civil liberty consists in a division of powers; it strikes down the barriers erected in the Constitution between the different departments of the Government. The tyrant's maxim, "That by dividing sovereignty you destroy it," has been unblushingly avowed in this debate in support of this bill.† Now, sir, if our Chief Magistrate is right; if he has penetrated deeper into political philosophy than the sages of the Revolution; if it be true that unity and simplicity be the most desirable attributes of a prosperous and happy government, no form of government is so unique as an unlimited monarchy; none so simple as an absolute despotism. But to return to the examination of the professed principles of the bill—mark the glaring hypocrisy; the open contradiction of theory and practice. The first feature professes the exclusive use of gold and silver in the moneyed transactions of the Government. This is said to be the vital spark of the measure; the soul of the body; the ethereal fire, that sublimates and sanctifies the scheme, and gives it its sacred constitutional characteristic. And yet the bill on your table, sir, upon its face, exposes the flagrant hypocrisy in its detail; it not only recognises the receipt of Government paper money, but State bank paper—and yet the President bases and vindicates this measure upon the principle that the Constitution, in its letter and spirit, forbids the employment of any other medium, in the receipts and disbursements of the National Government, than gold and silver. His Secretary of the Treasury deprecates the use of any other medium than specie "for the public revenue and expenditure, or as a standard for the value of property or discharge of contracts," not only unconstitutional, but positively "pernicious." This is the theory of the President and Secretary. Now, sir, let us compare theory and practice. In the very same state papers of the President and Secretary, a recommendation is made to Congress to issue ten millions of Treasury notes, Government paper, proven by woful experience to be the worst kind of paper money; bearing no interest; to be issued in small bills, ranging from $20 upwards, expressly to be used in the "receipts and disbursements of the Government;" to pass into general circulation "as the standard of property, and to be used in discharge of contracts." Thus you see, sir, so far were the President and Secretary from intending, in good faith, to carry out this boasted feature of the bill, they not only recommend and press upon Congress the issue of ten millions of Government paper, without interest, for the reason they say in the same state papers,‡ "that notes bearing much interest would soon cease to be used in circulation." And again, in order to force this Government paper into circulation, in the business transactions of the people, after passing this currency upon the creditor of the Government, they recommend "that it might be advisable not to make the bills or notes receivable, at first, for any public dues." I now come to the sublime excellence, the boasted superiority, of this Government currency. Mark the language, Mr. Chairman, and all other advocates on this floor of this hard money scheme, this gold and silver scheme, this measure of the Constitution, construed in its primitive simplicity, uncontaminated by latitudinous interpolations. "This kind of paper would be very convenient in form, ($20 bill,) it would contain the most important requisites appertaining to any paper currency—such as the greatest security, an entire specie basis, and the unity of all issues in one body." Pause and admire the consistency, the harmony of theory and practice, what an adaption of means to the end—"an exclusive one of gold and silver in Government transactions"—the only medium known or allowed by the letter and spirit of the Constitution. O, brazen faced hypocrisy! O, unblushing infidelity of profession and purpose! As further confirmation, if it be possible that any other proof can be asked, that it is not intended now, nor never has been from the beginning, in good faith, to carry this principle of the bill into practice, I call the attention of the committee to a brief history of this measure as connected with another associated measure that has always followed it as regular and as true as the shadow follows the sun in his evolutions. At the called session of 1837, when this Sub-Treasury was first broached and recommended by the Executive of this nation as a financial plan, the same state papers estimate the sum of money necessary to conduct the receipts and disbursements of the Government at ten millions. A deficit existed in the Treasury, owing to the indulgence upon merchants' bonds, and unavailable funds in the State banks. The Government at the time held eight millions in bonds upon the Bank of the United States—the President and his friends in Congress refused to sell these bonds even at par, refused a loan of money upon time at four per cent.; § issues ten millions of Treasury notes. Mark, sir, the exact coincident of amount with the estimate requisite for Government transactions, issued under the hollow professions of temporary want, with a provision of cancelment and discontinuance upon their return into the Treasury. At each annual meeting of Congress, from the called session to the opening of the present Congress, the same hollow, deceitful professions pervade the annual message of the President and report of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the "successful financial operations of the Government," boasting of the cancelment of the issue of Treasury notes—notify Congress and the country that the expenses of the nation can be met in future without any "new issue of Treasury notes, increase of tariff, or creation of loans." And yet, sir, scarcely have these State papers gone forth to the four quarters of this wide spread confederacy, under the frank of every member, political fee as well as friend, each successive session from 1837, so soon as the Sub-Treasury bill is reported in either House of Congress, eo instanti, an emergency springs up, "an unexpected exigency;" (such as a demand to discharge pension claims, the time of payment of which is fixed by permanent law) "a fluctuation," a starving paralysis seizes the Treasury—the private secretary, with pale face, almost breathless from exhaustion, rushes into this House with a special message demanding the re-issue of ten millions of old notes, or the issue of ten millions of new ones, in order to save "the national faith and national honor from being tarnished." Sir, this is no fiction; the executive documents, and the journals of the two Houses of Congress, establish this historical narrative beyond a dispute. But this is not all, sir; this only brings us down to the opening of the present Congress. In the annual message and report of the Secretary at this session, is to be found a strong corroborating circumstance, bearing upon this part of our inquiry—these two distinguished financiers, after three years severe study and scrutiny into the mysterious and abstruse science of finance, discover it was all a mistake on their part in supposing that ten millions of money would be needed in conducting the Treasury operations of the Government; they now conclude with that unhesitating confidence that belongs to a quack in politics, as well as a quack in medicine, that instead of ten, four or five millions is abundant for all the requirements of revenue. According to usage we find in the annual message and report the following language: (the exact copy of which, in substance, may be found in every annual message and report since 1837,) "The financial operations of the Government during the present year have, I am happy to say, been very successful—the nineteen millions of Treasury notes heretofore issued under the various acts of Congress, have been so punctually paid that the whole amount now unredeemed is less than three millions—if the money due from the banks is paid, and if Congress shall keep the appropriation within the estimates, there is reason to believe that all the outstanding Treasury notes can be redeemed, and the ordinary expenses defrayed, without imposing on the people any additional burden, either of loans, or increase of tariff, or increase of taxes." Now, sir, in the face of this boasted declaration you know, and the journal attests the fact, that no sooner than the bill under discussion passed the Senate, (which was done in race horse speed,) and was reported to this House, prior to any appropriation save one, even in compliance, much less transcending the Executive estimates, and when the banks had reduced their debt by payments to less than one million, the President rushes a special message into this House, clothed in reproachful language, imputing in its phraseology a neglect of public duty in one short month after the reading in this House the annual message—demanding the issue of five millions of Government paper of some kind, (mark the coincidence again between estimate and demand) not in the usual form, to be cancelled upon return into the Treasury, but to be re-issued for the space of a twelve months, calling upon Congress in the same State papers to invest him and his Secretary with the unlimited authority to issue Treasury notes and Treasury drafts to meet all "fluctuations and unexpected deficiencies" in the Treasury--such a power as no Chief Magistrate of the nation ever dared before to ask of Congress, much less demand in insulting language; a power that Alexander Hamilton, the open advocate of a strong and consolidated Government, never dared ask or exercise, but explicitly condemned as "seductive and dangerous" to the perpetuity of the Government; an exaction of power that would have received its merited rebuke in the purer days of this Republic, before this House was seized with the incubus of passive obedience to Executive dictation. I here close upon the first feature of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I now approach the consideration of the second great feature of this bill, the exclusive collection, keeping, and disbursement of the public revenues by Government officers, appointed by the President, and subject to removal at his despotic will. This division involves the question of the entire separation of the Government dues and the banking institutions, State and National; or, in the party phrase, the divorce of bank and State. This brings us to an important point in the consideration of this measure. This point involves many inquiries; it involves grave consequences; it demands full and deliberate investigation. Before I engage in the discussion of the principles embraced in the connection of the revenues of the Government with the banking institutions, it is due to the subject, it is demanded by the course of argument in this debate upon the part of the advocates of this measure, asserting it to be a scheme antagonistical and possessing less dangerous powers and more excellences, as a financial plan, than the system of a National Bank or State banks. This imposes the necessity of saying a few things upon the banking system in general, the origin of banks, their progress, their tendency, commercial, political, and moral. We have had, in the course of this discussion, learned disquisitions upon all these points; we have in the last few years read elaborate State papers from the Executive branch of the Government upon these several heads, as well as upon various other qualities of these institutions. But, sir, I will not stop now to go into the many abstruse and intricate questions raised in those State papers, and repeated in speeches every day upon this floor; I will not debate the metaphysical question, whether banks be "soulless corporations;" or the anatomical question, whether they be "monsters;" or the mythological question, whether they be "hydras or gorgons dire;" time and my strength will not permit, had I the inclination to enter upon these deep inquiries. I deliver them over to the exclusive use of the petty political demagogue. But it is charged by the advocates of this hard money scheme that banks are of aristocratic, despotic origin, Federal and anti-Republican in their tendency, dangerous to the perpetuity of liberty, absolutely incompatible with self-government. Yes, sir, the adoption or rejection of this bill is to determine, "we are gravely told, whether the people of this nation are capable of self government. These are serious matters, and if upon fair and candid investigation they prove tenable, it ought to settle this controversy, this great question, aside from any consideration of convenience or expediency. It shall be my purpose, in a very few observations, and by reference to undisputed, notorious historical facts, to explode all this tirade against banks. In tracing back the tide of time, where do we find the first model of a bank? We look in vain from the beginning of the Christian era through sixteen centuries, during the entire period of the dark ages, a period during the whole of which no free Government existed; aristocracies, monarchies, and despotisms, in their succession, the only forms of Government exercised by man for the protection and control of man; "no division of sovereignty to impair power;" century succeeded century, no improvements in arts, in science, in civilization, in government; the daily employment of rulers were their tilts and tournaments, supporting their wars and savage amusements by exactions and tributes, levied and collected in hard money from the people, by their receivers of revenue, (Sub Treasurers,) created by the chiefs of aristocracy. In the midst of this universal gloom and oppression, early in the sixteenth century, three small spots upon the wide surface of the globe struck up almost simultaneously, in different quarters, a spark of liberty. With free principles came commerce, and with commerce banks. Venice, Hamburgh, and Amsterdam, three republics, each claim the invention, each vie for the paternity. Certain it is that banks were coeval with the earliest existence of these republics; † "they were the offspring of liberty and trade; a Republican progeny, they have made or caused the use of popular industry, the diffusion of wealth and freedom among the great body of the people wherever they have appeared." Let us pursue history a little further upon this topic. Where do we find the next spark of liberty blaze up through the gloom and oppression of despotism? England. England, that had lived through sixteen hundred years, under every shade of aristocracy, monarchy, and despotism, with a hard money currency; Sub-Treasurers, as receivers, keepers, and disbursers of her revenue. Yes, sir, for 1688 long years, England had no paper money, no banks; her currency was coined money, gold and silver, guineas, crowns, half crowns, shillings, such as this scheme proposes, except the addition of eagles and half eagles, and hard silver dollars. And what was the condition of England during this hard money, Sub-Treasury reign? Sir, it is a short and a sad tale, if history tells it true. It was this: the poor man never became rich, the rich seldom became poor; society remained stationary; the face of the country continued as nature's God had made it, save a rude agriculture; no roads, no canals, no manufactures, no ships, no commerce, no diffusion of learning. The Revolution of 1688 came; it infused into the British Constitution the principles of freedom; the security of property, of person, and of reputation, was guaranied by the sacred charter of her liberties; the "unity and simplicity of her sovereignty" was split asunder, and the division of powers erected upon its ruin; confidence between man and man was soon established; credit, public and private, followed as a necessary consequence; and the first great offspring of that Revolution was a bank. Five years of freedom produced the Bank of England; not without opposition, Mr. Chairman; no, sir, no; there were anti-bank men of that day, "illustrious predecessors" of the anti-bank party of this day. We have amongst us, no doubt, legitimate lineal descendants of the old anti-bank stock. History says, the Tories of that day clamored against the bank. The Tories of that day predicted evils of all kinds from that institution. The bank, in the eyes of the Tory party, was a "monster," was a "hydra, full of gorgons dire;" yet the free principles of the revolution were preserved, the bank stood every assault, and stands to this day; its paper became in a short time, and continued to be, the principal currency of the country; it has been used in the "receipts and disbursements of the Treasury," "as the standard of the value of property and the discharge of contracts," from that day to this? And what was England in 1688, when compared with other nations of Europe? The poorest of any of the great nations of the continent, subordinate to France, inferior in every thing to Holland, the birth place of banks, inferior to Flanders in manufactures, at the end of the first century from that date, conducting the Government revenues in bank paper, with a paper currency used in all branches of business, she was the richest in wealth, the most advanced in arts, in manufactures, in commerce, is enterprise, in internal improvements, in arms; "the first in war, and the first in peace;" the first in letters, the first in science; pointing with just and exulting pride to her improved agriculture, her manufactures, her commerce, her ships, her canals, her railroads, her admirals, her generals, her statesmen, her philosophers, her men of letters, her poets; the greatest, richest, and happiest nation, save our our own glorious Republic, on the face of the globe.

Now, sir, I come down to the history of our own country. Prior to the Revolution we had no banks. When the Federal Constitution was adopted we had only three State banks with but limited capital. Our Constitution sprang out of a disordered currency, not bank currency, Government paper—its written promises to pay in the shape of Treasury notes, Treasury drafts, continental paper, such as we are now asked to substitute for a sound mixed currency of specie and bank paper, redeemable, on demand, in gold or silver. The Government paper, at that day, depreciated to ten cents in the dollar; public faith and private credit was destroyed; there was no internal trade, no commerce. The small amount of gold and silver there was in the country was hoarded up in private chests, "iron safes and vaults," or buried under ground. The Government loaded with a heavy national debt, unable to discharge even the interest on it. The rich were engaged in no enterprise; the poor man could find no demand for his labor; every thing was stationary, except wretched want and misery, which prowled through the land every where. History relates that such was the extremity of distress, that men, in their desperation, seized their arms and assailed the courts of justice, rather than witness the sacrifice of their property, under execution, for a song; rather than return home and meet a starving wife and children, they resisted the laws with guns and swords. A glorious experiment of a hard money and Government paper currency. If history be truly written, the experiment in that day drave the people to rebellion;* it drove some of them to the foot of the gallows; it drove several whole States to the verge of civil war. Sir, had the present Chief Magistrate and the present party ruled at that day, holding the principles they now do, this Government would have run a short race; her career would have been brief and gloomy, her days few and miserable. Fortunately for the country, patriotism, and not party, prevailed. The Palinurus‡ of State looked to his country, his whole country, and nothing but his country. The power to create a sound currency was granted by the Constitution, and amongst the first acts under that Constitution, was the creation a National Bank. It passed by an overwhelming majority, very many of the members who voted for it, being members of the convention who framed the Constitution, Republicans as well as Federalists. It received the signature of Washington, the father of his country, the President of the Convention that adopted the Federal Constitution; and yet, daily and hourly, we are nauseated and surfeited with the declaration, that banks in other countries are the offspring of despotism; in this country the progeny of Federalism, Anti-republican, anti-constitutional, subversive of liberty itself. Sir, had Washington a less share of public virtue, of unsullied patriotism, than Martin Van Buren? Did not Washington understand the workmanship of his own hand? Had not he as high a regard for the sacred principles of the Constitution as Martin Van Buren or any other self-styled Democrat of the present day? Or was Washington a political profligate? Answer these questions to the people of this country! O ye modern Democrats! are you prepared to say Washington was a Federalist—an Aristocrat—an enemy to liberty? If so, speak it out, or else cease your clamor against banks, one of the first and best fruits of his Administration.

I now come to the consideration of the connection between the Government revenues and the banking system. Before I proceed, I take this occasion to define my own position on this much agitated subject. That my opinions may not be misunderstood either now or hereafter, I avail myself of this opportunity to say, I do not now, nor ever have I entertained the belief, that the State banks, under any organization, unaided, unregulated and unchecked by a National Bank, could furnish a sound and uniform currency, or act as successful fiscal agents for the General Government, or safe depositaries of the public money. I would as soon entertain the the opinion, that the solar system could preserve its balance, the planets revolve in their proper orbit, with the sun stricken into annihilation, as to suppose that twenty-six independent sovereign States, each principle, owing no common responsibility, each acting for itself, having no common interest,‡ "could create a currency that would be sound and uniform, act as a successful and efficient fiscal agent, a safe depository of the public money, and afford trade cheap and abundant exchanges." Such a conclusion is to my judgment absurd, and that such a conviction should ever have filled the mind of any clear headed man, passes my comprehension. In this, I perfectly agree with the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania.§ He said, in his speech, in the discussion of this bill, "that we are all wise after the fact, but to look back, it has often occurred to me as wonderful, how we could have confidence in State banks as safe general depositaries of the public treasure." I will not do the gentleman the injustice to believe that he ever did confide in them; no, sir, never. With all the lights of experience burning bright before his eyes, is it impossible, utterly impossible. His head receives the compliment at the expense of his heart—that is no affair of mine. Now, sir, what is the history of this connection of the Government and the banks; when did it begin in practice, without law; and when was it legalized; and by what party was the legal connection established! The historical answer to these questions will give much light upon this disputed subject; it will refute many broad declarations; it will explode many fanciful delusions; it will exhibit before the country many statesman in their true colors; it will array the contending parties under their proper names. I aver, that the system proposed in this bill, is, in principle, the system of Alexander Hamilton, the open and manly advocate of strong consolidated Government, and that a legal connection of the Government and the banks, now and ever has been the system of the true Republican party. Now for the facts—I mean to deal in facts—they are profitable for instruction, for exposure of flimsy sophistry, low demagogueism, and wilful misrepresentation. Alexander Hamilton was the first Secretary of the Treasury under the Federal Constitution, the author of the financial system of the Government at that day; the author of the charter of the first National Bank; yet no legal connection of the revenues and the banking system is to be found in either statute. Hamilton, like our Democratic Chief Magistrate, had no objection to a connection with banks; but he wished that connection to be free, "voluntary," discretionary, untrammelled by statutory limitations and restrictions—a meretricious connection, to be formed at will and dissolved at will, whenever thought "desirable" and "profitable." How exact the ambition of the two men, yet how different in character. The first, bold, open, manly, avowing his preference for strong executive powers; the last, with a more insatiable thirst, has not the moral courage to avow it. He sneaks and skulks behind the flimsy glosses and disguises of an affected pain and reluctance in the exercise of Executive powers, imposed upon him by the duties of his office. I expect, before I take my seat, to unmask this modern Democrat and lay him bare to a deluded people in his true light. But to continue my historical narrative of facts. This union was practically kept up "voluntary and discretionary" with the President and Secretary, from the day of Hamilton's administration of the Treasury Department until 1816. It was then legalized, for the first time, by the charter of the second Bank of the United States. It is material to call to memory under whose administration this lawful marriage of bank and state was consummated; what party was in power; and above all what party carried this "most odious and abominable measure," containing more ills than Pandora's box, if the President and his great Southern, Eastern, and Western satellites are not mistaken or grossly exaggerate. Unless the history of that day is falsely written, James Madison, a Republican all his life, admitted by all parties, presided over this nation as Chief Magistrate and signed the bill of connection. John C. Calhoun, then a member of this House, drafted, reported, and voted for the bill of connection. It was a Republican measure, introduced and passed into a law by Republican votes, uniting every leading Republican, Crawford, Lowndes, Clay, Calhoun, Forsyth, and a host of others. The Federal party voting, almost to a man against the measure; and yet, with an unblushing audacity, it is asserted and reasserted in the progress of this debate the connection of bank and state is of Federal origin. But to continue the history of this legal connection to its termination. It lasted till '33, when the then President, operated upon by the malign influence of the present Chief Magistrate and his great coadjutor,† with a lawless hand, removed the public moneys from the United States Bank, the legal depository, and held them without law or limitation of law, to be used and abused to vile party purposes, until the passage of the deposite act of 1836. In 1833, ended by violence and usurpation, the first legal connection of bank and state. It will be borne in mind, the same party was then in power that now rules. Did we hear, then, the cry of divorce! divorce! divorce? No, sir. Any thing about "monopolies," "soulless corporations," "monsters," &c. (save the great monster,) no, sir. State banks became the especial "pets" of our President and his clique. Any thing about the dangers of "associated wealth?" no, sir. State corporations were as harmless as doves. Any thing about the lack of power in this Government to "regulate and purify" the currency? nothing. Any disclaimer of duty to furnish trade with safe and cheap exchanges? no, sir. Any thing about gold and silver being the only constitutional medium; no, sir, no. The very reverse of all this was contended for with a zeal that has no parallel, save it be found in the same party; now advocating the very opposite doctrines, and denouncing, with a savage bitterness, every principle they then asserted, every institution and every power they then vindicated.

Now, sir, to the principles, the great financial and political principles involved in the connection of bank and State. I intend to speak not now of the expediency, that is a subordinate matter; it is the boasted principle of divorce I wish to analyze; for in this consists the merit of the Sub-Treasury, if it has any merit. This is its marrow, its gist, its superlative excellence, if there be any sincerity in its advocates. I propose to test this question, first by authority, "for by authority is the world governed," as has been wisely said; not by argument, not by reason; blind followers listen not to argument, they close their ears to reason, so long as they confide in the patriotism and integrity of the objects of their idolatry. And the first authority I shall ask the attention of the committee to is a state paper, written (or rather published) over the name of Gen. Jackson, a name once of no mean authority with the majority of this House. There was a time, I know, sir, and you know, Mr Chairman, when you and the majority of this committee believed as implicitly in his sayings as ever a Mahommedan did in his Koran. Whether the same idolatry is felt for a setting sun as existed sessing unlimited power to charter banks upon no common when he was in the ascendant, is not for me to say; I know it is human nature to worship the rising luminary; history is full of the vanity of all earthly renown, mere human glory. As Shakspeare has it, "yesterday the word of Cæsar might have stood against the world," now, "none so poor as to do him reverence." Sir, I solemnly conjure you, and the majority of this House, before you pass this bill, to pause and consider upon the authorities I shall now refer to. I invoke you to look and gaze upon the political mirror of 1834-5, which I shall now hold up to your view, and see the ridiculous attitude of discrepancy, inconsistency, and tergiversation you will occupy; the ingratitude, treachery, and perfidy to the State banks, and the unpardonable infidelity and abuse of public trust to the country, with which you are about to involve, and blast, and infamize your private as well as public reputation. In the extracts I shall now read is to be found what was "nominated in the bond," upon the conditions of which you and your leaders were elevated to power. In the Message of 1833, speaking of this very measure—the Sub-Treasury, alias the Constitutional Treasury, alias the Independent Treasury—which had been proposed in this House in the session of 1834, this language is employed: "In the regulations which Congress may prescribe, respecting the custody of the public moneys, it is desirable that as little discretion as may be deemed consistent with the safe keeping should be given to Executive agents." The annual Message of 1836 contains this emphatic sentiment. "To retain the public money in the Treasury unemployed in any way, is impractibable. It is, besides, against the genius of our free institutions to lock up in vaults the treasure of the nation." Here we have a forcible and unqualified condemnation of the bill under discussion in the name of General Jackson. But, sir, this is not the only authority I have denouncing this measure. I now introduce another, though not so universal in its influence, equally potent and omnipotent in a certain section of this Union. I allude to the great Southern advocate of this bill, the distinguished star of the South,* who has a galaxy of smaller planets revolving around him, who never take the trouble to think for themselves: yes, sir, such is the magic influence of this Senator's opinions in a portion of this Union, particularly his own State, that his political dogmas are received as axioms, undisputed and indisputable truths, no matter how absurd, no matter how inconsistent and contradictory to previously entertained and expressed views. Whenever a sudden blaze of light flashes across his brain, whenever a fresh thought strikes his mind, in the twinkling of an eye his political followers wheel to the right about, and unite with the chief in denouncing the folly, the absurdity, and the abomination of the measure. Oh, South Carolina, once the land of true chivalry, the birthplace of Marion, Pinckney, Sumpter, Lowndes, Hayne, how fallen! In the language of the mother of the Gracchi, thou once could proudly boast of thy jewels, statesmen that thought for themselves, and acted upon their thoughts; now, you occupy the humiliating attitude of blindly following the erratic wanderings of an ever-varying political star, whose leading themes are, his contempt of personal popularity, and self glorifications over the beauty and symmetry of his political consistency—never forgetting to close his speeches with a peroration, consisting of his ineffable admiration of, and devotion to, State rights. Now, sir, it gives me no pleasure to show up the glaring political inconsistencies and tergiversations of this very distinguished man, nor will I attempt a complete exhibition; I wish only to trace his views and opinions upon the principles of the bill before the committee, as expressed at different times. Towards this distinguished individual I entertain no unkind personal feelings. I would that I could, consistent with my sense of public duty, draw a veil over his political changes, and conceal them forever from the light of day; but duty to the country forbids it, upon a great measure like this, reaching the very vitals of the Constitution. His name is one of the main pillars upon which this Sub Treasury rests—a measure, when taken in connection with its associated measures, that makes up the "system," as I conscientiously, before my God, believe to be pregnant with more mischief and ruin to the country than any ever adopted, or proposed to be adopted, as a permanent system of policy, since the foundation of the Government. Entertaining these views, to omit the use of any weapon of resistance to its passage, would be treason to the community, to the Constitution, to the cause of human liberty. Now, sir, let us see what this great man said and thought of this identical measure only six years ago; this measure, which he now assures his worshippers and his country is the only remedy, the great panacea, for all the distress and evils that afflict the land. I read from his speech of 1834, upon the re-charter of the United States Bank, in the debate upon which the three antagonist measures—of a National Bank, the State bank system, and the Sub-Treasury system—were all fully discussed; this is his language, the language of a profound practical statesman—no theory, no speculation, no metaphysics; it goes upon experience, the mother of wisdom. Hear him. I claim the attention of Southern members particularly. He says: "Any sudden or great change from our present to even a sounder condition, would agitate and convulse society to its centre. Whatever may be the different theoretical opinions of members of the Senate, as to the extent to which the reformation of the currency should be carried, even those who think it may be carried practically and safely to the entire exclusion of paper, must agree that the restoration ought not to be carried further than a cautious and a sure experience shall prove it can be done, consistently with the prosperity of the country, in the existing fiscal and commercial condition of the world; to go beyond this point, to which experience shall show it proper to go, would be to sacrifice the public interest merely to a favorite conception"—the "untried expedient," alias the Sub-Treasury. Solid wisdom marks every line, whilst no language could be more expressive, more forcible, in the condemnation of a measure. But, sir, this is not all. I find other paragraphs in the same speech, bearing directly upon this scheme, replete with deep and profound thought. In speaking of the leading feature of this measure, the exclusive use of gold and silver in the transactions of the Government, he makes use of this emphatic language: "But there is in my opinion a strong, if not an insuperable, objection against resorting to this measure, resulting from the fact that an exclusive receipt of specie in the Treasury would, to give it efficacy, and to prevent extensive peculation and fraud, (mark this!) require an entire disconnection on the part of the Government with the banking system in all its forms, and a resort to the strong box as a means of preserving and guarding its funds—a means, if practicable in the present state of things, liable to the objection of being far less safe, economical, and efficient, than the present system," (the bank system.) Again, in the same speech: "To suppress them (speaking of the banks) at once would, if it were possible, work a greater revolution, a greater change, in the relative condition of the various classes of the community, than would be the conquest of the country by a savage enemy." Sir, these extracts need no comment, no analysis; language could not be more explicit. In these few sentences, the two fundamental principles of this bill—first, the exclusive receipt and disbursement of specie by the Treasury; second, the resort to the "strong box" in the exclusive keeping of the public moneys, in preference to banks—are annihilated, immolated. Like a master workman, in debate, he seizes one proposition, and slays the other with it. Arming himself with the sword of experience, with the ponderous hand of a giant, at one fell blow he slays the "monster," and crushes him under his feet. Would to God, for his character, for the prosperity and happiness of the country, he had kept him there. But, sir, not so. Strange to tell, marvellously strange, in three short years a change comes suddenly over the spirit of his dream, and he sees, with a vision clearer than heaven's brightest sunbeams, that in 1834 he labored under a mental delusion; what he then believed and asserted was a sound system of policy, tested in the crucible of well tried experience, was now full of nothing but evil, mischief, ruin, and misery. The entire contents of Pandora's box would be trifles compared to it. But, lest I may be charged with exaggeration, I will read his own description. I read from the debates of 1837 upon this very Sub-Treasury bill. Speaking of the union of the Government and the banks, he says: "We thus glided imperceptibly into a connection which was never recognised by law till 1816, but which has produced more important after-consequences, and has had a greater control over the destiny of this country, than any one of the mighty questions which have so often and so deeply agitated the country; (mark this;) to it may be traced, as the seminal principle, the vast and extraordinary expansion of our banking system, our excessive import duties, unconstitutional and profuse disbursements; the protective tariff, and its associated system, for spending what it threw into the Treasury, followed in time by a vast surplus, which the utmost extravagance of the Government could not dissipate; and finally, by a sort of retributive justice, the explosion of the entire banking system, and the present prostrate condition of the currency, now the subject of our deliberations." Now, sir, I ask you and the committee to pause and remember that the author of the speech from which I have just read, was the draughtsman, the reporter, the able and successful advocate of the very bill—the bill of 1816, chartering a National Bank—that for the first time in the legislation of this country legalized the "connection" of the Government revenues and the banking system. Behold how, with equal dogmatism, this great man to-day asserts, maintains, and eulogizes a principle, a system of policy, and to-morrow contradicts, refutes, denounces, and derides the same; and yet, sir, always consistent, always penetrated with the deepest convictions, always stimulated by motives of the most elevated patriotism. Oh, the infirmity, the delusion of man! How long is our country doomed to be ruled by such leaders?

I now take leave, for the present, of the great southern pillar, of the Sub-Treasury, and ask the attention of the committee whilst I view the political course of another, not less distinguished supporter of this measure.† The great Western pillar, in point of influence, with the existing Administration and the country greatly his superior. Yes, sir, this individual was the master spirit of the past; he is now and has been the master spirit of the present Administration. With shame and mortification for the honor of my country, I make the forced acknowledgment. To him can be clearly traced every Executive movement upon the currency—every assault upon the Constitution—every high usurpation of power, for the last ten years Acting in secret collision with the present Chief Magistrate, through flattery and prejudice—they wielded the arm and directed the hand of General Jackson in every blow he made upon the currency and the Constitution, during his eventful Administration. His finger can be plainly and distinctly traced in every movement of the existing Administration; his intellect has been underrated; his influence in the Government misconceived, even by the most sagacious; his knowledge of human nature is profound; he understands the passions and motives of human action well; he knows how to administer to them; he has no scruples in the full exercise of his knowledge; he looks to the end to be accomplished; he hesitates not about the character of the means; principles with him are nothing, political capital, every thing; justice, right, patriotism, gratitude, mere abstractions. He views all the great powers of the Government as so many instruments, to be used at pleasure by the ambitious aspirant to obtain a party object, reckless of the misery and wo the measure may inflict on millions. If he sees a political rival in his way, he will blow the vanity, and, by false appeals, madden the prejudices of an old man, to strike him a victim at the cost of pulling down a sacred pillar of the Constitution. If he wants to achieve a political triumph, to gratify personal pique or pander to personal vanity, he can, with exulting self-complacency, look upon the desecration of the sacred charter of liberty, glorying in the perpetration of a deed that has inflicted a stain upon the bright escutcheon of this nation, that the fiery fingers of the fiend of hell can never erase—nor that more potent obliteration, the bedewing tears of pitying angels, ever wash out.

Mr. Chairman, I ask pardon for this digression, and now proceed to trace the political course of this distinguished personage as connected with the subjects immediately under discussion, and in connection with him, the currency views of the "illustrious predecessor," as well as his successor, who I hold responsible before this committee and the country for all the derangement in the currency, that now so sorely afflicts this community. I exculpate General Jackson from all blame; he was nothing but the clay in the hands of the potter; a mere ball of wax receiving his principles and opinions from the impress of the Senator from Missouri, moulded and touched by the magic wand of Mr. Van Buren. Not only have I said I would show gross inconsistencies and contradictions, but I have said I would fix upon these two personages perfidy, treachery, and ingratitude, towards the State banks, and infidelity in their public trusts to the country. Now, sir, these are high charges preferred against individuals filling high places. If I fail to make them good, I deserve to be branded as a foul calumniator. If I sustain them, as I confidently expect, they will receive, I trust, the punishment due to all such public delinquents—the withdrawal of the confidence of friends and sudden expulsion from the high places they occupy, accompanied with the undivided execration of a deluded, and abused people. But, sir, now for the testimony; and first let us see what were the views of these three distinguished personages in years that are past, relative to these State banks; these soulless corporations—"these rotten boroughs" of "associated wealth"—"the tail, fungus, the excrescence of the British paper system." I read from the message of General Jackson, first, "the State banks are found fully adequate to the performance of all services which were required by the Bank of the United States, quite as promptly and with the same cheapness."—Message, 1834. Again: "By the use of the State banks, it is ascertained, that the moneys of the United States can be collected and disbursed without loss or inconvenience, and that all the wants of the community in relation to exchange and currency, are supplied as well as they ever have been before."—Message, 1835. Again: "Experience continues to realize the expectations entertained as to the capacity of the State banks to perform the duties of fiscal agents for the Government." Again: "It has been seen, that without the agency of a great moneyed monopoly, the revenue is collected, and conveniently and safely applied to all the purposes of the public expenditure. It is also ascertained, that instead of being necessarily made to promote the evils of an unchecked paper system, the management of the revenue can be made auxiliary to the reform which the regulations of several of the States have already commenced, and which has only to be hastened by proper regulations by Congress, to secure a practical return to the extent required for the security of the currency, to the constitutional medium." Now, sir, in this short paragraph we have embodied three separate and distinct arguments against the principle of this bill. 1st. It is here assumed that the revenues can be collected, safely kept, and conveniently applied, by the State banks. 2d. That the connection of the revenue with the banks, instead of promoting the evils of an unchecked paper system, this union of Government and the banks can be made an instrument in the purification and regulation of the paper currency. 3d. It asserts, unequivocally, that the measures of the Government can be so managed as to make a mixed currency of State bank paper and specie the constitutional medium. Three positions tearing up by the roots the two leading features of the Sub-Treasury, an exclusive specie currency, and an exclusive agency of Government officers, as well as the incidental quality claimed in its support of purification and regulation of the paper currency. For the future reputation of this old man, I would that I could stop here; justice to the subject forbids it. These were the views published over the name of General Jackson, when it was the interest of the party to make political capital out of the State banks. They were then puffed to the skies, praised and eulogized; this was necessary to make them willing and efficient auxiliaries to aid in demolishing the Bank of the United States. This object being effected, the great scheme of the Sub-Treasury could now be openly avowed; but to consummate the end so long and so devoutly wished, but adroitly kept in disguise and concealment, the work of bank "demolition," had to be carried one step further before it could be successfully accomplished. The State banks had next to be demolished with that charactetistic fitfulness which is always associated with the first conception of a heinous deed; it now shows a gleam of faint light above the horizon, and anon withdraws it from the sight—so with this wicked scheme. In the message of 1829, it is just faintly shadowed forth without bones, muscles, veins, or arteries. The distinguished statesman then at the head of Ways and Means, animated by a purity of patriotism that seldom falls to the lot of frail man, bursted from around him the shackles of party, and cast the chains to the winds, rising equal to the exigency of the occasion, momentous as the exigency was; directed by his colossal intellect, his giant arm seized the half-shaped monster and gave him his quietus for the time. The serpent was only scotched, not destroyed. He was permitted to rest in a kind of doubtful torpidity, waiting a more propitious opportunity. Appearances were altogether specious; it was never, from that day to this, for one moment abandoned by its secret authors. The deed was too daring in the green tree of the past Administration. Passive subserviency to Executive dictation had not then gained the ascendency in this and the other House of Congress. The project slept unseen, except by a small glimmering in the message of 1830, and 1831, it was insidiously brought forward in the recommendation of the removal of the deposites, in the message in 1833. The spirit of Congress was still too pure to sanction so lawless an act. But, sir, the master spirits of this grand scheme were not to be foiled or disheartened by these discomfitures into an abandonment of their plan. By the appliances of flattery and excited prejudice, they stimulated Gen. Jackson to assume the responsibility of seizing the public treasure—Cæsar like, from the custody of the law—a strong engine of Executive power actively wielded by the master spirits in securing the succession. The most potent instrument aided by the exuberant popularity of the then President, in effecting that result. Now I repeat it. Never did any man labor under a more fatal delusion than our present Chief Magistrate, in supposing his election turned upon any great question of national policy. He is nothing more than the missletoe, the fungus oozed out of the hickory tree, sustained and bolstered up by the corrupt use of the people's money. The deposite act having passed in compliance with the repeated importunities contained in every message from the time of the removal of the deposites, praying for the action of Congress, restraining the discretion of the Executive over the Treasury, it obtained a most reluctant approval of the President, after full inquiry and ascertainment that a veto would not arrest it. Sir, the restoration was doomed to short life. Those who had used this potent engine to so much profit, felt most grievously its loss. Hence the systematical efforts made through a pliant Secretary of the Treasury, to arrest a successful operation of the act, at the sacrifice of the State banks, the ladder of their elevation. But what cared the President elect for honor, gratitude—'tis something—'tis nothing—office was attained, but office was to be perpetuated at any sacrifice. He knew well the influence money had exercised in bringing him into power, and that a continuation of this influence alone would preserve that power; therefore it became necessary to blow up the deposite system, that it might again become the reluctant duty of the Executive, in the discharge of the duties of his office, to take the public money under his voluntary and discretionary management, that he might repeat the hollow and deceitful petition in his messages, praying Congress to take from him all the discretion not indispensable from the duty of the Executive. And how, to the life, has he imitated his illustrious predecessor in this particular. To make assurance doubly sure, the specie circular is issued forthwith upon the adjournment of Congress, in contempt of its opinions so recently and decidedly expressed. This is associated with a studied want of financial skill in the execution of the deposite law; knowing that upon a suspension of the banks by the operation of the deposite law, the revenues would necessarily fall into the hands of the Executive, and there remain uncontrolled by law until Congress could act. Having the Senate and Executive in his own hands, knowing no action of Congress could take place save such as he might dictate, for the ensuing four years; hoping in the mean time that in the general wreck, uncertainty and confusion that must prevail, unusual distress, public and private, that such an overwhelming catastrophe must produce, he would be enabled to force, by duress of wo and misery, the people to take refuge in the embraces of this scheme, at present simple and apparently harmless; but intended, in due season, as I hope to prove beyond doubt or cavil, before I sit down, to terminate in a great mammoth Treasury Bank—an odious engine of tyranny.

And at last, in the year 1837, after seven years' labor in the mean time, half concealed, half disclosed, the Sub-Treasury rises on the country, assuming at first entrance the humble cognomen of "Sub"—growing a little more confident by age, it claims to be called constitutional—becoming impudent by indulgence, it arrogates, in the three short years of quasi existence, to be called Independent. Yes, sir, it already boasts its independence of the country—of the sovereign people—of every thing save the favored office holders. And the many thousands who, in 1834, denounced it as a monster, now vie with each other in rushing to "worship and adore the golden idol." But to leave this digression and return to the opinions of Gen. Jackson upon the subject of banks and this grand scheme. I had traced him down to 1836. In his farewell address, he pronounced the country "prosperous and happy," to be sure intermixed with some dark hints about "contractions and expansions, and revulsions, ebbs and flows in the currency, engendering a wild spirit of speculation," &c. But yet, after all, he concludes with this declaration: "In our domestic concerns there is every thing to encourage us; and if you are true to yourselves, nothing can impede your march to the highest point of national prosperity." How unknown is the mysterious future, even to the most sagacious! In two short months the suspension comes—not partial, as had repeatedly happened before without producing much of a shock, but universal. It now became the interest of the party in power to change sides and write down the banks, and write up this scheme they so bitterly derided in 1834—the scheme that had been denounced by the almost undivided voice of the party now in power. The identical proposition receiving but one Van Buren vote in this House upon Gordon's resolution; pronounced by the official organ, (that never dared speak upon any great financial question of this kind, but as directed by the President, he moved and stimulated by Van Buren and Benton,) as disorganizing revolutionary, subversive of the fundamental principles of our Government and of its entire practices from 1798 down to this day. Again, from the same paper. "It is as palpable as the sun, that the effect of this scheme (alias the Sub Treasury) would be to bring the public treasure much nearer the actual custody and control of the Executive than it is now, and expose it to be plundered by a hundred hands, where one cannot now reach it."

Again. "Had such a suggestion come from Gen. Jackson, it would have been rung through the Old Dominion. See how he wishes to put the public money directly in the palms of his friends and partisans, instead of keeping it on deposite in banks, whence it cannot be drawn for other than public purposes without certain detection. In such a case, we should feel that the people had just cause of alarm, and ought to give their most watchful attention to such an effort to enlarge Executive power, and put in its hands the mean of corruption." Again, same organ—mark this: "It is well known that the President himself is opposed to this project, and that his friends in Washington, whether of the cabinet or not, heartily concur with him in the course of policy it is expedient to pursue." Again, the same organ: "If Gen. Jackson had suggested such a system, (the Sub-Treasury,) what peals of patriotic indignation would have burst from eloquent Senators against the usurper and tyrant who desired to get the millions of the Treasury into the very hands of his partisans and parasites." Again: "We verily believe that the present system (State banks) of deposites for the public money, regulated by law as it will be, is as good for safety, and the least liable to abuse by the Executive, of any which the wit of man can conceive." Now, sir, I have not read these extracts to prove to the House what were the opinions of the Editor of the Globe in reference to this scheme of a Sub-Treasury in 1834; no, sir, that would be a small business. My purpose in reading these extracts is to show this House, and this nation, what were the views of the party at Washington in 1834, as avowed in the official organ, published at the very doors of the President and cabinet, speaking by authority the sentiments of the party upon this scheme of a Sub-Treasury. You have it here expressly admitted, had Gen. Jackson advocated this very identical Sub-Treasury scheme in the year 1834, he would justly have been called a usurper, a tyrant. Now, in this year of our Lord 1840, Martin Van Buren recommends and advocates the same scheme of a Sub-Treasury, and he is, by the same party, lauded to the skies as a Democrat, a Democrat dyed in the wool: and all who oppose this scheme are branded by these self-styled Democrats as Federalists, aristocrats, monarchists, friends of despotism and tyranny. Oh, unblushing impudence! Oh, the blindness of party! Oh, the credulity of an honest and confiding people! How much longer will you slumber? When, oh, when will you rise in your majesty, and vindicate your abused confidence, an I strike with the sleepy sword of justice (almost grown rusty for the want of use,) your unworthy public servants? But, sir, to return to my facts. The banks having suspended in May, 1837, by the maladministration of the party in power, having been used and abused until, by their aid the party had "demolished" the Bank of the United States; acting upon the true Machiavelian policy that consistency, honor, and gratitude, were attributes unknown to the character of a practical politician; going upon the principle that ends were every thing, means nothing; that the true theory of a republic was a strong and rich Government and a poor people, it became the cardinal principle of the party to denounce the banks so recently and so extravagantly eulogized by them as the real touchstone of party orthodoxy. Now, sir, this was a sudden and violent somerset, as you know, I have no doubt, by woful experience, Mr. Chairman, for any man to make who had any regard for political consistency, moral integrity, or future reputation. Yes, sir, the man of character, of conscience, nauseated at the very contemplation; and the history of the times records many noble examples now illustrating in political exile, and bearing with self-approbating and self-consoling composure the bitter denunciations of "apostate and deserter," the triumph of patriotism over the shackles of party, or the allurements of ambition. To their names will immortal honor attach; to their reputation let undying praise be given; statues should be erected to their memories. But, sir, how was this scheme to be broached to the country? Here was a double imposture to be carried at one move upon the political chess-board. The favorite pet banks were not only to be repudiated, denounced, "divorced," from all connection with the Government and the party, but this "disorganizing and revolutionary," this "usurping and tyrannical" scheme was to be substituted in their place. Sir, I hazard the assertion, to be submitted to any impartial man, that the history of all times past does not furnish in her political annals, a move so reckless of all decent respect for the just judgment of mankind, for the intelligence of the people, for the intelligence of Congress, the people's representatives; omitting the treachery, the perfidy, and ingratitude towards the State banks. But, sir, the measure had to be attempted and accomplished, or the party sink. The Bank of the United States had been put down and decried as a monster; the State bank system, in despite of all the puffing and blowing, had realized the prophecies of all the sagacious statesmen of the day; the Sub-Treasury which had slumbered from 1829, but which, by the by, had been the favorite bantling of the present Chief Magistrate, and the "great expunger," as I will demonstrate before I am done; they tolerated for party purposes the most violent maledictions, to be poured out upon its unshaped head; exercising vigilant caution themselves to let slip no word of denunciation, mark this, Mr. Chairman, whilst you and others were used as the blind dupes of party, to carry out the grand drama of putting down the United States Bank by the use of the State banks, as a half-way house, to make way for this magnificent scheme of finance. The "great humbugger" and the "Little Magician" kept their mouths hermetically sealed; a studied silence on their part was preserved. An impenetrable curtain was kept hung up between these two master spirits and the blind instruments of party they were using, as so many puppets, to carry out their dark and damning deeds of policy. But the question came up, how is this movement to be effected? Did the President dare propose it in his own name? No, sir; he was too sagacious to be caught in that trap. He knew full well that such a measure, bearing simply his endorsement, though the Chief Magistrate of the nation, would never pass the ordeal of public approval; he thought of the party laudation upon the State banks; he thought of the party denunciations of the Sub-Treasury scheme in 1834; he knew that the weight of his name as authority, though in office, when opposed to that of General Jackson at the Hermitage, was as a grain of sand compared with the mountain. He knew that he lived, and breathed, and moved in the political atmosphere of the old Hero. The car of State being in the mire, Hercules had to be called to the wheels before she could be moved from her fastness, believing and "boasting" that his popularity could stand any thing and every thing. Accordingly, in the month of July, 1837, a letter is concocted by the 'great humbugger," forwarded to the Hermitage, sent to Washington with the signature of the old Hero, published in the official organ, branding the pet banks and merchants with "treachery and perfidy." What a shameful abuse of the name, the authority, the popularity of an old soldier, to bolster up a sinking party at the sacrifice of the public goed. But, Mr. Chairman, still more humiliating and mortifying to the heart of the patriot, is that this scheme is now about to be consummated in the shape of a solemn statute. A scheme, before that God to whom I am responsible for what I am about to say, I believe the annals of human delusion cannot furnish an example of more impudent, audacious, and monstrous imposture. A scheme which the Administration are, at least for a time, about to palm forcibly and unwillingly upon the people of the United States, under the flimsy and deceitful guise of returning to the "constitutional currency," the primitive simplicity of "a hard money Government." Nothing can transcend its audacity, its atrocity, whether we look at the means of accomplishment or the end to be achieved.

The conduct of the vile seducer is not blacker than the conduct of the ruling party towards these State institutions. When the war commenced upon the United States Bank, these State banks were in successful operation, treading in the line of duty, pursuing the dictates of prudence and virtue, doing a safe and profitable business for themselves and the country; the 'serpent came among them; he courted, flattered, wooed, and threatened them; he finally overcame their resistance to importunities; they yielded to gilded promises of profit and protection; they were used and abused in meretricious association, until the purpose of the party was accomplished; the excesses, forced upon them by their alliance, weakened them, and made them an easy prey; they are turned upon, and slandered, repudiated and discarded.

I now proceed to trace the political course of the Missouri Senator upon the measure before the committee and its associated measures, particularly the State bank system. I expect to establish upon him and our Chief Magistrate a degree of treachery, perfidy, and ingratitude towards those institutions, and of delinquency and infidelity of public trust to the country, unparelleled in the annals of human actions. These, sir, are strong charges, high imputations, but I confidently expect to make them good. Should I not, I will be justly branded as a wilful libeller. Should I succeed in sustaining my charges with proof, incontestable proof, I confidently hope these public officers will receive the judgment due their political delinquency, so long merited at the hands of a deceived and deluded people, forfeiture of public confidence and expulsion from their high stations, as soon as the forms of the Constitution will permit. I shall offer no controverted or debatable testimony in support of these allegations; I shall rely exclusively upon facts, recorded facts from their own speeches and State papers. Yes, sir, out of their own mouths shall they stand convicted of every charge I have preferred. Who, unacquainted with the political history of this country prior to 1837, would conceive it possible in the nature of human changeability, that either of these distinguished personages have ever advocated a paper money system, and the worst part of the system, the State banks? Every honest man would answer, it cannot be so, it is too base, too profligate. He would exclaim, the infamy that would follow the establishment of such a fact, would blacken the character of a fiend of hell itself. I am not responsible for consequences, they belong to the actors. I am handling facts, and facts I intend to use, cut whom they may and however deep they may. I place the "great expunger" † upon the witness stand; I appeal to his recorded confessions, undisputed and indisputable, against himself and his accomplice, the present Chief Magistrate, who I know will not question the credibility of the witness. I now read from the speech of the Missouri Senator, delivered in 1834, upon the bill to recharter the Bank of the United States. "Mr. B. deprecated the spirit which had broken out against the State banks; it was a spirit which augured badly for the rights of the States; those banks are created by the States, and the works of the States aught to be respected; the stock in these banks were held by American cititizens, and ought not to be injuriously assailed. The spirit of hostility to the State banks is of recent origin, and seemed to keep pace with the spirit of attack upon the political rights of the States." But, sir, this is not all; in the same speech, he says: "The resolution of 1816, admitting the notes of all specie paying banks to receivability in the payment of Federal dues. It was a resolution of cardinal importance for the regulation of local paper currency. The effect it had in rectifying and purifying a disordered currency had been too much overlooked. Its professed object was to regulate the currency of the State banks, and to regulate it by the power of the Federal Government, through the agency of the Treasury Department." Again, from a speech delivered in 1836, in the Senate, upon the Specie Circular, we find this language: "Never before did the prosperity of the country equal the present time. Never was there such exuberance of prosperity." Again, in same speech: "No longer can banks set themselves above law and above Government; no longer can they stop payment." Now, sir, I will read an extract from a speech of this session, made upon the bill under consideration. Speaking of these same State banks, he says: "Sir, what is the banking of the United States, but the tail, the fungus, the excrescence of the British paper system? What is it but this; look at it in all its parts, in the aggregate as well as the segregrate, and see what it is—how weak in itself—how dependent upon others. The banks of the South and West, built upon the sandy foundation of borrowed paper, and dependent upon those of the Northeast; those of the Northeast are dependent upon the paper fabric of England; the whole banking system of the United States has its centre in London." Now, sir, let us pause for a moment, and analyze these various passages. This honorable Senator, in 1834, deprecates any disparagement of the State banks, as a violent assault upon State Rights, as a wanton attack upon the "stock of American citizens." But what more? He eulogizes the revolution of 1816, the instrument of the first legalized union of the Government and the State banks, known to the history of our legislation; lauds its "simplicity," its "efficiency" in "regulating," "rectifying," and "purifying" the disorders of the local paper currency. And how is this great desideratum effected? Hear him: "By the power of the Federal Government through the agency of the Treasury Dpartment." And how? By a "divorce" of the Government revenues from the banks? No, sir. By exacting Government dues in gold and silver, as this bill proposes? no, sir. But by receiving State bank paper in discharge of all dues to the Government—a complete union of bank and state. And yet in 1840, the same Senator denounces these same State banks, "those institutions of the States," to have been at the time of these vindications and eulogies, as well as now, the tail, the fungus, the mere excrescence of the British paper system, having no solid foundation; denounces the union of the Government with the State banks, "as recommended by Jefferson" to President Washington, and opposed by Hamilton, "as rank Federalism." I will now show that the Senator of Missouri and the Chief Magistrate were one and the same, Castor and Pollux, twin brothers, in their financial and currency views, opinions and policy. In doing this, I will demonstrate, from documentary testimony, authorities that no friend of the party in power will dispute, that it never was the intention of the present Chief Magistrate, or of the Missouri Senator, to continue a permanent connection of the Government with the State banks; that they only intended the league to last until by alliance with these institutions, they could succeed in demolishing the United States Bank. Yes, sir, the perfidious and treacherous stratagem was conceived and consummated of enlisting the co-operation of the State banks, to aid the work of "demolition" upon the monster, regardless of the ultimate ruin of the State institutions, or of the prosperity of the country. Now, for the proof of this proposition, I read from the official organ of 1839, an article upon this point; every word of which I hold the President responsible for and so will the country. He feeds and fosters and clothes the dirty kennel by his patronage; reads it every morning before breakfast; rolls its wilful falsehoods and filthy slanders under his tongue, as so many sweet morsels. It does not publish any thing he does not authorize or approve. Hear the article: 'Let those who now inveigh against the employment of State banks at that time, (1834,) look back and ask themselves, whether it was possible for General Jackson to accomplish his object by any other means. If he had proposed a separation from all banks, he would have forced all the State banks and their friends in full and effective alliance with the Bank of the United States." In connection with this article, I read from a speech of the Missouri Senator upon this point, delivered this session, upon this bill: "If any one asks when it was I commenced to labor for the establishment of an Independent Treasury, I answer, I began this labor on the day I began my labor to terminate the existence of the United States Bank. That Bank was in the possession of the two precise privileges, which would constitute the new system, the privilege of paying the public dues in her own notes, and the privilege of keeping the public moneys. Now, it is evident there could be no Independent Treasury until these bank privileges were abolished, and to abolish them, the bank itself must be brought to a close. It was necessary to get rid of that institution before we could begin to erect the Independent Treasury. Demolition was to precede erection. True, the transit was not direct from one to the other. There was a half way house between them; as indispensable to be stopped at, and tarried in awhile. (Mark the emphatic language.) This half way house, as every one understood, was the State bank deposite system. We continued in it three years, from 1834 to '37. It blew up, and we left it, and the Democratic party then took the decisive ground of going the whole distance and erecting the Independent Treasury; basing it upon the two pillars of keeping its own money, and using nothing but hard money." These, sir, are precious confessions upon this point; murder will out; corroding conscience sometimes forces disclosure—unguarded and brazen confidence sometimes—pride of self gratification and vanity sometimes. The moving cause of this development is manifest to the dullest mind. '"O truth where is thy signet; O shame where is thy blush!" Sir, my heart sickens at the contemplation—my soul sinks into deep humiliation at the degradation of my country's honor. It impairs my respect and admiration for the forms of popular Government. What else do we hear; what else have we heard for the last ten years dinning in our ears from the dominant party, but professions of unbounded faith in the intelligence and virtue of the people? Vox populi, vox dei—the voice of the people is the voice of God—has been the burden of every State paper coming from the Executive for the last ten years. The favorite and cherished theme of every demagogue in Congress and out of it, of the party in power. And yet, sir, if there is any credit to be placed in the authors of the passages I have read to the committee, it is indisputable that the people, the dear people, the intelligent people, the profound people, the virtuous people, the people "whose opinions and wishes should always be consulted in the adoption of any great measure," so far from having their "opinions" and "wishes" consulted upon great public measures, involving not simply their prosperity, but their very existence as a free nation, have been studiously kept (by these self styled Democrats,) in the most profound ignorance of what was secretly meditated. The people could not be trusted with the secret. They had for seven long years been kept upon the green, but deceptive surface of a full charged volcano, unconscious of the danger beneath, tantalized by hollow, deceitful, and treacherous demagogues, blinded by flattery and deluded by specious, but false appearances of permanent prosperity. They, who, for sordid and selfish purposes of avarice and ambition, have by syren songs lulled them to sleep, or if they even aroused them, it was only to write the sentence of political ostracism against the patriot who had moral courage and public virtue sufficient to proclaim the danger that awaited and threatened them.

But, sir, I have said Mr. Van Buren and the Missouri Senator were Castor and Pollux, twin brothers, in all this crusade upon banks and currency, in all this perfidy and treachery to the State banks, in all this system of infidelity to the preservation of the public moneys, in all this delinquency of duty to the people as their "public servants." Now, sir, I intend to prove it, every word of it I mean to prove. Sir, I know these details of facts are tedious perhaps; they are bound to be minute and individual in their bearing; but it is due to the just appreciation of the character of these individuals, filling high places, to the proper amount of authority their names should weigh in the consideration and adoption of this or any other great measure of public policy; and, above all, it is due to the abused faith of a too confiding and deluded people, that the part played for the last ten years in the great drama of bank "demolition," currency demolition, exchange demolition, finance demolition, and public and private property demolition, should be freely and faithfully spoken, written, and published to the people of this country and the world. If the effort should fall still born, as I have every reason to fear it will upon the majority of this House, and possibly upon the people, though I pray God not, yet I shall still have the consolation of having discharged my duty.

Now, sir, I proceed to offer the testimony to establish the political twinship of Mr. Van Buren and the Missouri Senator.‡ I read from a letter, written in 1834. Alluding to, and speaking of Mr. Van Buren, he says; "I have know that gentleman long and intimately; we entered the Senate of the United States together thirteen years ago, sat six years in seats next to each other, were always personally friendly, generally acted together upon leading subjects, and always interchanged communications and reciprocal confidence." Again, the Senator from Missouri, in his speech of this session upon this bill—"the catastrophe of 1837 was preparing, and I saw it as distinctly before it happens as afterwards. In the winter of 1836, I pointed out this catastrophe to the President elect, the now President of the United States. I invited him into the Finance Committee room of the Senate in the winter of 1836-7, four months before the banks exploded, and made known to him my opinion of the coming danger. I spoke to him in his high charactar of President elect, and to warn him of the danger that was to salute his nascent Administration. I should not mention this, was it not that the President himself well remembers it, and often mentions it. I had no more doubt then of the coming explosion, than I had after the nine hundred banks of the Union had shut up." Shall I multiply proof? I have more at hand, but will not stop to read; none but the sceptic, it seems to me, can doubt, after the facts already furnished. But I must claim the attention of the committee to a brief analyzation of this paragraph. It discloses more important information upon another point. Besides the twinship, it fixes, beyond the power of escape, when taken in connection with the speech of 1836-7, and a sentence to be found in the inaugural of Mr. Van Buren, in these words, he says: "In all the attributes of a great, happy, and flourishing people, we stand without a parallel in the world; we present an aggregate of human prosperity surely not elsewhere to be found." Now, sir, mark the dates, for dates sometimes are all important in scanning facts. Remember that in 1836 the people had fifty millions of dollars on deposite in the State banks; depositaries selected, recommended, and endorsed as safe places of the public treasur by these distinguished personages. The currency of these banks also recommended and endorsed to the country as sound, in the speech of 1836; and in the inaugural of the 4th of March, 1837, four months after the "private conversation in the Finance Committee room," in which conversation it is agreed that the State banks were rotten, that the currency was unsound to the core; that explosion, a universal explosion, must come and come quickly; and yet no public avowal to the dear people of the imminent danger of their fifty millions of money deposited in these banks; no public notice of the ruin, the universal ruin, that was ready to burst upon the devoted heads of those who had been worshiping at the shrine of the golden idol; but, on the contrary, a studied silence, disguised under the most plausible and positive assurances that all was well, all sound. Can any further testimony be asked, to establish the charge of infidelity to the Government as guardians of the public treasure; of wilful delinquency and treachery to the people?

Mr. Chairman, before I close my observations on this branch of the subject, it is proper to review more minutely the views and opinions of the present Chief Magistrate upon the subject of State banks; to contrast his opinions at different periods, that the committee and country may have a standard by which to value the worth of his present views. I commence as far back as 1829; I read from State papers. In his message when Governor of the State of New York, he says; "The most important business of the session will be the question of the renewal of the charters of the several banks in the State; thirty-one charters would expire in the course of four years, with a capital of fifteen millions;" he then proceeds to say: "That to dispense with the banks altogether is an idea that seems to have no advocate;" he says: "That experience is against banks owned wholly by the State; and that, to make stockholders liable in their individual capacity throws the stock into the hands of irresponsible persons." He repudiates the practice of exacting "bonuses" for bank charters, and says: "That, compared with the community, stockholders are few; and hence the legislative measures should refer exclusively to the safety and ability of the institutions." He then presents a brief epitome of the "safety fund system," and recommends its adoption. Now, sir, these are the recorded opinions of our hard money President in 1829. We find in this message no hing about gold and silver being the only constitutional medium; nothing about an "exclusive metallic currency," except a denunciation of it as a humbug; nothing of "monopolies, privileged, irresponsible, soulless corporations," nothing of the danger of "associated wealth" to the perpetuity of our free institutions; nothing of the "delinquency of morals" engendered by excessive bank issues, and wild speculation; but, on the contrary, exclusive State ownership of banks repudiated; corporate association, with individual stockholders, vindicated; liability of stockholders in their private property denounced; the charging of "bonuses" reprobated; the weakness of stockholders, as compared with the power of the community, urged as a reason why the legislation should especially regard the "safety and stability of the banks."

Now, sir, I must acknowledge, had I not long since adopted for my motto "nil admirari," wonder at nothing, I should have been struck with surprise and amazement when I first read this State paper. But to come down to a more recent date. In the celebrated letter to my colleague, S Williams, written in 1836, the present Chief Magistrate endorses and approves all the recommendations and eulogies of his illustrious predecessor upon the State banks, no difference of opinion, perfect harmony between him and the late President upon the various currency movements of his eventful administration; no one doubts it. I have already given the reason. He boasts in that letter of the successful fiscal operation of the State banks, of their safety as depositaries, of the promptness and facility with which they transferred and disbursed the public funds free of charge to the Government; he speaks exultingly of the soundness of their circulation, of the cheapness of domestic exchanges, the increased amount of such facilities furnished to trade over and above the United States Bank in any given period; the regulation and purification of the currency, and the increase of gold and silver, proceeding from the policy of the Administration in the judicious management of the public money as deposites in the banks, now denounced by him as the vicious, pernicious union, "injurious to banks, currency, and Government."

Lest I may be charged with misrepresentation, Mr. Chairman, as every thing is disputed these times, and these views are so antagonistical to Mr Van Buren's present views, I will read from that letter a few paragraphs, that there may be no mistake upon this point, and the first extract will show you what a profound financier our worthy Chief Magistrate is, as illustrated by experience. "No rational plan for the regulation of the fiscal affairs of the country, can fail to succeed, if the mass of our industrious and enterprising population, without regard to local, sectional, or political distinctions, are only sincerely desirous for its success." Now, sir, this letter is written in August, 1836, a few short months after the passage of the deposite law. A "plan for the regulation of the fiscal affairs of the country"—supported, passed into a law, voted for by overwhelming majorities of both parties, in both Houses of Congress, and signed by President Jackson. No candid man will say that the "great mass of our industrious and enterprising population, without regard to local, sectional or political distinctions, were not desirous for its success" The President will not say it was not a "rational plan." This would be casting a deep reflection upon the intelligence of his own friends; it would be a denunciation of the very measure, the lever that lifted him into the high station he now occupies, if the sagacity, sound judgment and well matured opinion of his friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] is entitled to credence. That distinguished Senator, in his able speech this session upon this very bill, speaking upon that act, uses this strong and emphatic language: "I verily believe the present Chief Magistrate would never have been elected had it not been for the passage of the deposite bill." Now, sir, the question recurs, why did this "plan" fail; was it not a "rational plan?" The President will not say so; he dare not say so. The names of the ablest statesmen of this or any other age, of all parties, stand recorded in its favor. I have given you the reason in extenso in my remarks already delivered. Mr. Chairman, the reason is summed up in this short sentence; it was not the "plan" of Martin Van Buren, Thos. H. Benton, and the secret cabinet, composed of names that I will not defile my tongue nor offend the ears of this committee by mentioning. It left no "voluntary," no "discretionary" powers with the Executive. It defined in terms of rigid specification, the duties and powers of the Secretary of the Treasury. It interposed an impassable barrier between the public purse and the Executive. It did not provide by law for a union of the purse and sword in the hands of the President; the consolidation of all powers; despotism in its most odious shape. In fine, it was not the "Independent Treasury," which the Senator from Missouri tells you and the country he and Mr. Van Buren have been covertly aiming at and assiduously struggling for since 1830. Sir, with the proofs I have furnished, can any honest man doubt why it was this plan so suddenly failed? See the executive weapon resorted to, instantly upon the adjournment of Congress, the specie circular; ordered in the teeth of every member of the Senate, save two, the Senator from Missouri being one. The identical measure had been proposed a few days before the adjournment as a legislative measure and rejected. A weapon of itself sufficient, as it proved to be, if wielded for evil, to arrest the "success" of the "fiscal plan," the deposite act, passed with such unanimity in Congress, and received with such hope and joy by the country. The specie circular, a measure justified under the pretence of checking the sales of the public lands, and stopping the over issues of the banks, and saving the public treasure from loss. How hollow; how false; how delusive. It was not needed for the second purpose, as the deposite act of all measures was best adapted to answer that end. It could not effect the first object, as the money, immediately upon payment to the various receivers, was placed in the most convenient banks, ready to be loaned out the same day. The operation in this respect proved by experience, and was admitted in the annual message of the President, as he was bound to admit, however unpleasant, unsuccessful. It amounted to a financial rotary motion, a mere circle of payments and discounts of the very same specie, paid into the banks one hour and loaned out the next to some favorite speculator. It totally failed in the third purpose, having no adaptation to the end; it imposed no restraint upon the depositories; it simply operated unjustly, unequally, and unconstitutionally upon the public receipts. But, sir, it produced effects—effects ruinous to the finances, ruinous to the country. This measure deranged the whole internal commerce of the country, producing panic, destroying confidence by the Government blowing up bank credit, and breaking up exchanges, at the very time when the banks were in a critical position, performing a heavy operation, in fulfilment of the requirements of the deposite act, a crisis when the banks and the country should have been permitted to have made the best possible use of their resources, without violence from the Government. Yes, sir, if patriotism had prevailed with the rulers of this nation, instead of interposing Government embarrassment, the fostering hand of Government should have been extended For the sake of the country, for the sake of the people, for whose benefit Government is instituted, and not for the sake of the banks, every aid not inconsistent with the Constitution, would have been afforded at this trying crisis. But was it done? no, sir, no. The success of that measure was at war with the grand scheme of the cabal I have named; party policy demanded its defeat; the sacrifice must be made and was made, in despite of the fact blazing in their faces, as clear as heaven's sunbeam, with it must be sacrificed the true interests of the people. And yet, sir, the "Great Humbugger" exclaimed 'glorious specie circular," "the ever glorious specie circular," and his idolatrous crew of worshippers, embracing the new President, echoed and re-echoed the maniac sound, repeating the more than Gothic exclamations of the party, during the pressure of '33 '34, "perish credit," "perish commerce," rather than abandon the success of the grand scheme. Never was the power of the Government more wantonly or basely used, to effect a political end. As a financial measure it did violence to all the laws of trade and commerce, by the direct and forcible interference of Government. A result too plain for any man of even mean sagacity not to see who understood the first rudiments of finance and trade Ignorance or misjudgment affords no apology. Commerce has its laws, maxims, fixed and invariable principles, unchangeable; this measure done violence to the plainest one of these principles, it carried the money from whence it was due, and sent it to a section from which it was owing; "it took it from the creditor and sent it to the debtor, it reversed the laws of commerce and exchange. Instead of easing the exchanges, at that time much unbalanced, by ordering the revenue from the debtor section of the country to the creditor, where it was received for disbursement, thereby aiding to square the balance of trade between the South and West, and the East and North in its practical operation, it reversed the current of exchanges, and ruinously increased the balance. It not only had this deleterious effect, but it diminished fourfold the amount of circulating medium in the creditor section, in addition to the unnatural abstraction of the amount received for sales of land. The requisition being made in gold or silver alone, every dollar withdrawn from the banks to meet the order in council, took away the basis of four dollars of paper currency. But this was not all. The panic, alarm, confusion, and apprehension, excited upon the community, operated to an extent that defies human calculation. Some conception may, however, be formed by the ravages that ensued; the unmitigated mischief that followed to the Treasury, to all classes of society, to all sections of this wide spread Union.

I do not intend, Mr. Chairman, to be understood as saying all the distress and ruin this country has suffered proceeded alone from this measure, or that there would have been no explosion in the currency; this I do not believe; "antecedent causes" had been operating for years, the fatal effects of which were bound to produce a moneyed crisis; it had only been postponed by factitious circumstances, thwarting the regular connection of cause and effect; but what I mean to say is this: the catastrophe was hastened, aggravated, egregiously aggravated, by this measure. There would have been a partial suspension, but not universal; there would have been no national bankruptcy, no universal, all-pervading distress, unparalleled individual insolvency, but for the adoption of this "despotic order," so "glorious," ever "glorious" in the estimation of its authors, wantonly pernicious and wicked in the estimation of every man who will look impartially at the condition of the country now, and contrast its condition then, and listen to facts, and candidly attribute effects to their just and natural causes, and give "to human passion its natural agency in stimulating human action." Now, sir, to leave this digression, and return again to Mr. Van Buren's Bank views. From the same famous letter, I read this paragraph: "The amount transferred by the deposite banks from June, 1835, to April, 1836, was over seventeen millions of dollars; the operation has been without loss, failure, or expense." Again: 'In regard to the domestic exchanges, the amount performed, at the last returns, by the deposite banks, exceeded thirty millions; which would be, in a year, one hundred and eighty millions. It further appears these exchanges have been effected at a lower rate than by the United States Bank" I here close the testimony upon the President's Bank opinions. I will not weary the committee with any comments of mine; indeed, no comment is needed; the facts are plain, intelligible, fully sustaining every allegation I have made, bold and daring as they may have seemed, at first blush, to those who had not taken the pains, or had the curiosity or the means of reviewing these topics. I have been thus minute in laying bare the political history of these distinguished personages, not to gratify any feeling of envy or malice; my bosom repudiates any such motive; not to exercise a malignant vanity at showing up the ridiculous and multifarious tergiversations and inconsistencies of great leading politicians; not to draw off the attention of this committee from the true merits or demerits of this measure, by dealing in the argumentum ad hominem, which of itself, I admit, neither establishes the truth or falsehood of a proposition; but my object has been purely patriotic. I know that, with the great mass of men, particularly in times of high party excitement, authority is every thing; reason, abstract reason, solid argument, nothing. How else could I check error, and break the spell of delusion, fatal delusion, that has deceived and misled thousands and tens of thousands of confiding followers; forming their opinions upon the simple authorities of others, without thinking for themselves, than by holding up in broad but true relief the political history of these men, that the people might see how often they had already been humbugged; and if they were disposed to profit by sad and woful experience, steer clear of future difficulties by withdrawing their confidence from such a pack of political charlatans.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot do complete justice to this part of the subject without noticing briefly the opinions and statements, at different periods, of another distinguished individual upon the topic of State banks, as likewise upon the measure now under consideration. This individual is now, and has been for a series of years, honored with the high station of Secretary of the Treasury, Chancellor of the Exchequer; his character as an able financier, and as a faithful public officer, has received in this debate the highest encomiums; every device has been resorted to, to give force and weight to his views and opinions, and to bolster up and varnish his reputation as a man and a faithful public servant. It is due to those maltreated institutions—it is due to the complete history of this topic—it is due to the people of this country, that these false clothes should be torn off of this individual; that his gross inconsistencies, his glaring contradictions, his stupid ignorance, or his wilful turpitude, should be laid open to public view. That the deceived and deluded people may learn and know how little importance, how little credit, ought to be given to even the sworn official statements of the highest Executive officers of this nation. I ask the attention of the committee and the country to facts, stubborn facts, and figures; these are the weapons of truth, sacred truth. The special report of Secretary Woodbury, communicated to Congress in 1834, on the public moneys, speaking of the Sub-Treasury, the very same project contained in this bill, he says: "This kind of personal agency, (alias the Sub-Treasury,) in the opinion of the undersigned, is to be avoided, because it is less convenient, less secure, more complex, if not more expensive." In same report, speaking of the comparative safety of the State banks with the United States Bank, or Government agents, (alias the Sub Treasury,) he vindicates the State banks by reference to tables, figures, and facts; proves conclusively their preference over sub-treasurers as safe depositories. Speaking of the losses the Government had sustained from State banks, he says: "Thus the truth on this much misunderstood and misrepresented subject, is, that in 1817, when the deposites were ordered by the charter of the second United States Bank to be placed in that institution, and the State banks were discontinued as depositories, and only about sixty State banks failed to meet all the demands on them with promptitude, the whole indebtedness of the seven deposite banks when they failed was only $139,010; and they have since paid to the Government $133,169. These payments, independent of some interest, leave due only the small sum of $6000. Notwithstanding the wide-spread commercial distress of 1817, 1818, 1819, it will be seen that only four more deposite banks suspended payments between 1817 and 1821; one only in 1818, which has since paid all its debts; another in 1819, which owed only about $17,000, as a deposite bank; and two in 1821, both of which have settled every thing originally due. Thus the truth on this much misunderstood and misrepresented subject, is, that four out of the number of the selected banks have discharged all their liabilities, and the residue of the liabilities of all the others, as deposite banks, is less than $35,000. This is not a tythe of the sum which has frequently been lost to the Treasury by the failure of individual merchants on their bonds for imports; nor equal to the sum frequently lost by the failure of many single disbursing agents connected with the different departments of the Government, and under large bonds for security." Again, from the same report: "If we include the whole present dues to the Government from discredited banks, at all times and of all kinds, whether as depositories or not, and embrace even counterfeit bills and every other species of available funds in the Treasury, they will not exceed what is due from two such fines, of almost one hundred banks, not depositories, which, during all our wars and commercial embarrassments, have heretofore failed in every part of the Union, in debt to the Government on their bills or otherwise, it will be seen by the above table that the whole of them, except seventeen, have adjusted every thing they owed, and that the balance due from those, without interest, is less than $82,000. Justice to the State banking institutions as a body, whose injuries to the Government have been almost incredibly exaggerated, and whose great benefits to it have been almost entirely overlooked, has led me to make this scrutiny, and submit its results, under a hope that it will in some degree not only vindicate the banks from much unmerited censure, but justify this Department for the confidence it has recently reposed in them." This report next treats of the State banks as fiscal agents—compares them with the United States Bank—then of the commercial benefits—their ability to furnish exchanges—amount annually—cheapness—the soundness of their currency—its great uniformity of value—equal to the paper of the United States Bank; and if not, still he argues in the report there should be no re-established Bank, for this reason, because, he says: "All the advantages of a paper of high and general credit could be obtained, if deemed necessary, by Congress merely authorizing the issue of Exchequer bills or Treasury notes in public payments, and every object deemed valuable as a paper currency could be obtained as a revenue measure constitutionally." He then proceeds to descant upon the benefits to the Treasury, of a connection of the Government dues with the State banks—the "regulating," "rectifying," and "purifying" operation of this union of Bank and State upon the currency. He concludes with this unanswerable argument against the "Sub-Treasury," and preference of the State banks over that measure: 'In considering their safety, it should constantly be recollected that the owners of banks are like other individuals, interested to transact business securely; and desirous of making, not losing money; and that these circumstances with the preference in case of failure, being in favor of depositors and billholders over the stockholders, united with the security, if not priority given to the Government, render them, in point of safety, generally much superior to individual agents of the United States." Again: "It is gratifying to reflect, that the credit given by the Government, whether to bank paper or bank agents, has been accompanied by smaller losses in the experience under the system of State banks in this country, at their worst periods, and in their severest calamities, than any other kind of credit the Government has ever given in relation to its pecuniary transactions." Hence, he concludes in these words: 'Governments cannot be administered without giving some credit to debtors, and to collecting, keeping, and disbursing officers. Changing the name of the debtor or the debtor himself, from a bank or corporation to an individual, does not produce any change over the nature of the transaction, and does not prevent it from still resting upon credit, and leaving in some degree, liable to all its dangers and disasters. Hence, unless the States and the United States, should both deem it proper to dispense with the paper system (and which event is not anticipated) the Government cannot escape occasional losses from that quarter, and can never hope to escape all losses from banks or fiscal agents, except by the employment in their place of individual agents, who will pobably be found less responsible, safe, convenient and economical." This is Secretary Woodbury, in 1834. It was then the policy of the Administration to write up the State banks, to insure their strength as allies in demolishing the United States Bank—a leading part of their policy as I have heretofore shown. I have read but short extracts from this report, and epitomized the substance of the residue accurately and faithfully; it consists of fifty long pages; to read it all would fatigue the patience of the committee. Much of it is contained in the extracts from the letter of the President to S. Williams. Every finance and currency idea contained in that famous letter is taken from this report, much of it verbatim et literatim, as any gentleman can see who will trouble himself to read and compare. A pure and rich fountain of financial and currency lore, worthy to be drank at by the Chief Magistrate of a mighty people; fit original, fit copyist, par nobile fratrum; a noble pair of brothers. It now, Mr. Chairman, becomes my painful duty to compare these extracts read from this report, and copied and endorsed by the President, as I have read to you, in his electioneering manifesto, with the statements of this same President and Secretary, in the annual message and report communicated to Congress at the opening of the present Congress upon these topics, and particularly upon the point of losses to the Government, by the employment of State banks as fiscal agents and depositories. I read first from the report of the Secretary, copied in the message and endorsed: "Losses appear to have occured from defaulters among officers in every administration. The largest amount of loss from each class has been by deposite officers, consisting of banks, and including as the resolution requires, the depreciation on such of these notes as were taken for public dues. The loss by this class, at the lowest estimate, has exceeded six millions and a half of dollars. The aggregate of all these topics, taking the lowest estimate for banks, is about thirteen millions. The losses by the banks alone have been nearly as great as by both disbursing and collecting officers united, and is more than three fold as great as by collectors and receivers." Here are glaring contradictions, gross discrepancies, not simply of opinion, of theory, of speculation; but contradictions of fact, of figures—figures taken from the same table, flagrant discrepancies of calculation, from the same data. The precise, full and complete information, and evidence, was before the Secretary in 1834, when he presented his views and his calculation of losses, from which he made his calculations in 1839; and yet such palpable contradictions, such inexcuseable misstatements, in either the one or the other report, I venture, cannot be found in the fiscal State papers of any civilized nation upon the face of the globe. I defy all history, from the beginning of time, to produce a parallel. It gives me no pleasure to expose this unpardonable official misconduct. I speak not in anger or malice, but with emotions of shame and mortified pride for the degradation of national honor. How must such things appear to enlightened foreign nations—how humiliating to every votary of a free Government—how will they be viewed by impartial posterity? Our children will blush for the disgrace of their fathers.

Mr. Chairman, a short extract from another authority upon this measure, and I have done with this branch of my subject. I am about to read from an authority that is considered orthodox with you, sir, as well I believe as all others of the sons of the Old Dominion, who agree with you in political sentiment. It is for your benefit and edification, and for the benefit and edification of the school to which you belong, that I read it. I fear were I to pass it over, I would be charged with a want of courtesy, after the various authorities I have referred to. I read from the Richmond Enquirer, September 8, 1837; that venerable editor, after denouncing this very measure, this Independent Treasury, as it is now called, then called the "Sub-Treasury," as an "innovation," an "untried expedient," more "expensive," less "convenient," adding "a dangerous increase of Executive patronage." He winds up in these emphatic words: "The Sub-Treasury has never been sanctioned by the Republican party. In 1791, Mr. Madison argued against the necessity of a National Bank, by urging the employment of State banks. The same argument was preferred by Mr. Burrell, in 1811, against its recharter. It was again called into requisition in the attempts to charter, and then continue the second United States Bank. In fact, the State banks have been adopted at every crisis, and not the sub-agencies."

Now, sir, it becomes my unpleasant duty to explode another financial idea of our Chief Magistrate. It is a favorite delusion with him and his Secretary. It is to be found, with a slight alteration of phraseology, in every message and report since his inauguration; it is mixed up in all their State papers, to bolster this measure. Never was there a grosser humbug palmed off, or attempted to be palmed off, upon an intelligent people; yet, from want of exposure, the community not being in possession of the facts, the tables to detect the imposture, it has obtained many believers. The idea is this—that the augmentation of specie, from thirty millions in 1833 to eighty-five now, is attributable to the wise policy of this and the past administrations. The President, in speaking of the wisdom of the policy pursued by himself and his illustrious predecessor, says: "Its results have already been too auspicious, and its success too closely interwoven with the future prosperity of the country, to permit us for a moment to contemplate its abandonment. We have seen, under its influence, our specie augmented beyond eighty millions of dollars." Now, sir, was there ever a more daring assertion made in the face of figures. By reference to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, laid upon our tables, and published to the country, it appears that our gross imports have exceeded our exports the immense sum of one hundred and seventy one millions of dollars in the last six years; allowing, then, seventy-one millions for profits of trade, which is extravagant, and we have a balance against us of one hundred millions of dollars. How is it, then, that we have had an increase of fifty-five millions of specie in the last seven years? According to the regular course of trade, we ought to be stripped of the eighty-five millions, and fifteen millions in debt in addition. That we are not in that predicament is not the fault of this Administration. How is it, then, we present such an anomaly in finance and commerce, the balance of trade continually against us for the last ten years, and still specie amounting to the immense increase of fifty-five millions flowing in? A paradox difficult to be comprehended at a superficial view, easily explained when the facts are understood. With the exception of a few millions arising from the Neapolitan, Spanish, and French indemnities, this entire influx of precious metals is to be accounted for alone by the discount of American securities in Europe, of various kinds, bank stock, railroad stock, canal stock, &c. And, sir, no man knew this better than our Chief Magistrate and his Secretary; to doubt their knowledge, is to impute to them a degree of ignorance that should impeach them, and remove them both from office. And yet you find this arrogant imposture, this daring humbug, iterated and reiterated in every message, and in every report of the Secretary since 1836. But, sir, this is not all. Our worthy President, not content with robbing the States and individual corporations of their just merit, in order to make political capital to save a sinking Administration, to shift the distress that hangs on the country, and the bankruptcy of the Treasury, from the mismanagement and misrule of the Administration, he in his late message arrays the amount of this State debt, exaggerates the true amount nearly one-half, as I will show from an accurate table, to magnify its importance and its indiscretion; misstates the condition and profits of those improvements; throws all the influence of his high official station into the scale, to blow upon the credit of these securities in Europe, to the embarrassment, delay, and ruin of some of these noble enterprises. The heart that could meditate and perpetrate so wicked a design, a course so ruinous to the private interests of thousands of praiseworthy citizens who have staked their all in these works, so prejudicial to many of the States who have embarked largely in a system of improvement, now uprofitable because of their unfinished condition; so destructive to the general prosperity of the country, meets not my envy. Listen to the language of our Chief Magistrate upon this topic, so alien to his duty, so foreign to the appropriate topics required of him by the Constitution to be "recommended" to Congress. He says, "The foreign debt of our States and corporations can scarcely be less than two hundred millions, requiring more than ten millions of dollars to pay the interest. This sum has to be paid out of the exports of the country, and must of necessity cut off the imports." Now, sir, I had supposed this was one of the very things we needed as a nation, a diminution of imports; at all events, it is one of the boasted effects to be produced by this very bill; but more upon this point by and by. To proceed with my reading—"In lieu of the comforts which it now brings us, we might have our gigantic banking institutions, splendid, but in many instances, profitless railroads and canals, absorbing the surplus fruits of national industry for years to come, and securing to posterity no adequate return." Upon this topic, as upon all others, we find our President and the Missouri Senator in perfect harmony—Castor and Pollux.

I now read from the Senator's speech at the opening of this session on the "Assumption of State Debts:" "Such are the representatives of the State debts, the best of the banks are doing but little, the best of the roads and canals are barely paying repairs, management, and interest. The mass of these institutions and works may thus be characterized—barren banks which cannot lend, suspended banks which cannot pay, unfinished roads and canals which are useless, finished ones which are either bringing their owners in debt, or barely paying the expense of repairs, the cost of management and interest upon the outlay." I cannot do justice to the history of this subject, without introducing a name I would gladly omit, but I am not permitted to do so. It finds itself in bad association, but we are told that politics, like misery, makes strange bed fellows. The adage was never more true than in this instance. I now read from the speech made this session by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Calhoun] on the same subject: "But the States are deeply in debt, and it may be said what shall be done? I know they are in debt, deeply in debt, and I deplore it. Yes, in debt, I am not afraid to assert it, for the most idle projects, got up and pursued in the most thoughtless manner. South Carolina is also in debt; she has spent her thousands in wasteful extravagance on one of the most visionary schemes that ever entered into the head of thinking man." Now, sir, do the annals of human malignity furnish such a conspiracy against harmless, unoffending, enterprising citizens, private corporations and State institutions? Is there to be found in the tide of time, in the legislation of any Christian people, a combination of discordant politicians, making common war upon enterprises and institutions over which they have no jurisdiction, out of the sphere of their legislation? Enterprises, however "worthless and profitless" they may appear in the judgment of our Chief Magistrate; however "visionary" in the conception of the practical statesman of South Carolina, I pronounce, and posterity will pronounce them works that a Bridgewater might envy, a Bonaparte be proud of. Knowing the biography of our Chief Magistrate and his private griefs, I am not at a loss to account for his readiness to seize any occasion to detract from the well-earned character of the author of the great Erie canal, when by doing so, he can manufacture political capital. *These words yet ring in his ears: "A political grimalkin, purring over petty schemes, mousing over sinister stratagems, without elevation of mind or dignity of character." †The indignant and scornful contempt of an insulted widow, whose husband had been persecuted to the verge of his grave, no doubt provoked and renewed anew the festering malignity of this "little animal." But I must confess I am at a loss to account how it is, that the Senator from South Carolina could find it in his heart, for any purpose earthly, to blur the brightest star in the wreath that surrounds the brow of the departed Hayne. But, sir, the most fatal matter connected with this rhodomontade against State institutions, and State and individual enterprises, affecting the reputation of the conspirators, is that facts and figures flatly controvert their material statements. Nothing they have said will bear the test of examination. Now, sir, it is untrue that they are indebted 200 millions or 170 millions, or that they have nothing to show for their debts, but "worthless, rotten British goods." It is not true that at any one of them is "visionary" in the judgment of any sound practical statesman. I am here provoked to read a short extract from the speech of the Hon. J. C. Calhoun, delivered in the House of Representatives, on the 4th of February, 1817, upon a proposition made by him to set apart the bonus and dividends of the United States Bank for purposes of internal improvement. This statesman, in that able speech, after advocating the constitutional power of Congress to make internal improvements; yea, sir, the most latitudinous construction of the Constitution to be found on record, advocating the expediency and sound policy of exercising the power by the General Government, concludes with a specification of the objects of communication. This is his own language: "The first great object is to perfect the communication from Maine to Louisiana. This may be considered the principle artery of the whole system: the next is the connection of the lakes with the Hudson. In a political, commercial, military point of view, few objects would be more important. The next object of chief importance is to connect all the great commercial points on the Atlantic, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Richmond, Charleston, and Savannah with the Western waters, and finally, to perfect the intercourse between the West and New Orleans." Now, sir, this, at the day it was spoken, might have been, and was deemed "visionary," yet, what was then thought wild theory and mad speculation, are now, (with two exceptions,) glorious realities, and those two far advanced towards completion, and but for the paralysis brought over their progress, by this unkind and unnatural assault upon State securities, by which their credi has been injuriously and unjustly affected in foreign countries, (where the authority of such names have undue weight, and the true condition of these works are not known,) would be in rapid progression. I leave it to this honorable Senator to reconcile these two speeches. I know his superior excellency in harmonizing seemingly inharmonious contradictions, at least to his own entire satisfaction, if to no one else. I now ask the attention of the committee to the facts upon the subject. I must be indulged in this seeming digression. My constituents have a deep interest in this ‡ "most visionary" project—it is necessary to a full analysis of the message—it is one of the topics then discussed in connection with the measure before the committee for adoption. Now, sir, for the facts upon these various points. After the many and repeated misstatements by individuals high in office, whose elevated position alone would give credit and importance even to a speculation, much less a positive assertion, the only sure way, I trust I may say without any just cause of offence, of coming to a just conclusion, is by undisputed ascertained facts. How, then, do the facts stand upon these various points? And, first, the amount of these State debts. The President estimates it at not less than two hundred millions; the Missouri Senator at one hundred and seventy millions; either of which estimates exceeds the true amount one hundred millions, or at least one equal half. Much of this over estimate is manifest from the very table referred to by these two able financiers, I allude to Comptroller Flagg's report. That report makes the aggregate sum of State stocks issued and authorized to be issued, for banking, canals and railroads, turnpikes, and miscellaneous objects, at $170,805 177. Now, sir, it is strange it should have escaped the attention of these sagacious statesmen, who have assumed to themselves the high prerogative of lecturers upon individual and State improvidence and extravagance, that there is a striking difference between a stock authorized to be issued and stock actually invested, so as to make it bona fide a debt. Millions of this one hundred and seventy authorized have not been cashed, for want of a purchaser; millions have never yet been offered in market; millions have by subsequent acts of legislation been repealed and cancelled; millions have been paid off. Second point: these improvements are "profitless, not yielding cost of management, repairs, and interest." I now read an official return upon this point, showing the nett dividend—the lowest, 6¼ per cent.; the highest, 16¾:

Now, sir, in mortifying contrast with the declarations I have read from these American citizens, permit me to read a short extract, bearing upon this point, from the paper of a distinguished foreigner,† an able and intelligent engineer, after a tour through the United States for the express purpose of viewing our public works, particularly railroads. He makes this statement: "According to the facts collected during my travels in the United States, there are now 3,000 miles of railroad completed and in operation, 425 locomotives, and I believe, up to the end of 1839, the length of railroads may amount to 4,100 miles; the capital invested, about sixty millions; the average result of the railroads now in operation in the United States is, that they give a yearly interest of five and a half per cent. on the capital invested. This result must be regurded as very satisfactory, because the greatest part of the lines have only been a few years in operation. On all the lines there has been a yearly increase of at least fifteen to twenty per cent. in the gross income; so that those lines which do not pay now, will give, in a few years, a handsome dividend. I have no doubt the large capital invested in railroads in the United States will not only produce an incalculable benefit to the country, but likewise pay the shareholders a dividend which, under good management, by the constant progress in population and trade, must likewise from year to year increase. I would request the particular attention of our Chief Magistrate to this publication, it would furnish him much useful knowledge that he seems to be in profound ignorance of: it would teach him a spirit of candor and magnanimity that he seems to be a stranger to, no doubt in consequence of his recent associations. He would there learn some wholesome lessons of political economy—how to advance national prosperity and national union—from the example of a king. He will there learn, whilst he is ransacking the practices of foreign monarchies, from the Emperor of all the Russias to the Emperor of Morocco, the Imaum of Muscat, for precedents for his hard money, iron box scheme, to recommend it to the favoritism of a free Republic, that the ¶King of Belgium has discovered some other things more necessary to a nation's prosperity, a nation's happiness, a nation's perpetuity, a nation's grandeur, a nation's glory, than "vaults," and "cells," "iron chests," "locks and keys;" more useful monuments—the derided objects of our enlightened Chief Magistrate and his Senatorial allies; monuments of peace, of utility, of intelligence; monuments calculated to advance the national welfare, commerce, industry, and independence of the people. This enlightened monarch has discovered, in order to make a people tranquil and happy, they must have employment, just reward for labor; that there is an intimate connection between the financial prosperity and the business prosperity of a nation: that the ability to bear taxation was measured by the productive wealth of the nation; that an impoverished people could not long sustain a heavy exaction of tribute: and, above all, he will learn that that monarch illustrated by his policy, in his encouragement and fostering protection of useful enterprises, such as railroads and canals, his practical wisdom and statesmanship—the tendency and effect of which was to bring his nation into more intimate contact, and to form it into one large family; by which the actual national device, "union fait la force," (union gives strength,) becomes realized.

Sir, let our worthy Chief Magistrate read this paper, and then his annual message, and, unless he has lost all sense of shame, it seems to me his cheek must redden, and a wounded conscience pierce him with mortified reproach. I could read tables to the committee, upon the subject of our canals, equally conclusive. Ascertained facts, from the official reports of the various State officers, exhibit a handsome profit to the stockholders, besides the incidental advantages incalculable to the States and to the nation—advantages social, commercial, military, and political. But I forbear; time will not permit.

3d. As to these "gigantic banking institutions, most of which must rot down on their foundations, before the bonds are due upon which they were built," from the official document now before me, on my table, furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, on this subject, showing the condition of the State banks, made out from official returns, we are informed that there are in the United States, at this time, 958 banks and branches, circulation one hundred millions, amount of debt four hundred and fifty millions, amount of bank capital three hundred millions, amount of individual deposites seventy-five millions, amount of specie thirty-five millions. Now, sir, this tabular statement shows the banks of this country, at this moment, to be in a more sound condition, as a whole, than they ever have been since this was a nation—even the golden period, when the President and his party were lauding them to the skies; decidedly a safer proportion of specie to the amount of circulation. Allowing twenty million of one hundred in circulation to be in deposite with the various banks as balances, which is less than a fair allowance, according to the Secretary's own computation, and it leaves only eighty millions of bank paper actually in circulation—but little over two dollars to one of specie. Why is it, then, I may be asked, there are one half of them suspended? Sir, I answer, the unceasing warfare of the Administration. Ground your arms; hurl this despotic measure back to the monarchs and despots from whom you have borrowed it, to the dark ages of barbarism; hold out the protecting arm of the Government; strike down the black banner of "demolition," and raise the banner of peace and of protection, and I stake my reputation as a prophet that in six short weeks these banks will rise up, phœnix-like, from their ashes, and move on in their accustomed channels. Sir, what is the afflicting disease of the country at present? Not a pressing foreign debt. Foreign exchanges are at from 106 to 107, lower than they have been for years. Not a lack of money—seventy millions in the vaults of the banks upon private deposite, our crops uncommonly good—all these evidences of general wealth, and yet the entire business of the country is struck with a paralysis; the poor man cannot find demand for his labor, nor the rich man for his capital; a deadly incubus hangs over the land. And why is it? Sir, it is the uncertainty of the future, the instability of Government, the unceasing interference with the currency, the credit of the country, the most sensitive of all things; the quack experiment upon experiment, and expedient upon expedient; hence arise the agitation and alarm of the future; no man lends, no man borrows, every one hoards, security shaken, credit destroyed, national embarrassment and individual distress inevitable.

4th. The proseeds of these State debts, "British dry goods, gossamer, and lawn," received and worn out. In response to this, I refer to the table I read from, proving incontestably the acquisition of 55 millions of specie, the proceeds of American stocks. Besides, in the last ten years, we have imported 84 millions of dollars worth of iron, about 25 millions of which has been for railroads. If I am correct in my estimate, we had 80 millions well accounted for, which, taken from the 100 millions of true debt, leaves only 20 millions to be explained, which I have no doubt was wisely invested. I am now through with this ruthless onslaught upon State credit and the credit of private corporations, because they stood in the way of the grand scheme of the party, and could not be made subservient to political purposes. These recreant railroad companies have not passively bowed to the upstart tyrant of the Post Office. Here is reason, sufficient with others I have given, for the attack upon them. The "gigantic banking institutions" stood in the way of the Independent Treasury; that is sufficient reason for an uncompromising hostility to them, together with the fact that a large amount of these stocks belonging to a State institution,* towards which our magnanimous President and the leaders of the party entertain a rabid hatred, a political monomania.

I proceed now, Mr. Chairman, to consider the specific merits or demerits of this Independent Treasury scheme. And first, the specific financial objections to the measure.

1st. Its inconvenience is admitted on all hands: other things being equal, friends and foes acknowledge the superior convenience of banks in facilitating the transfer of the public moneys. I will not detain the time of the committee by reading extract upon extract from the messages of the President, and the reports of his Secretary upon this point, a point too clear, with any due regard for candor, to be debated, though some whole hog orations on this floor have even controverted this point.

2d. It is more expensive. This objection is also conceded by the President and his Secretary, but by no means to a just extent; it is admitted and attempted to be justified. They have both sophistically and ingeniously endeavored to fritter away this objection, appreciating its force, the Treasury being bankrupt, and a message teeming with homilies upon retrenchment and economy. They admit an additional expense of $60 000 annually, besides the cost of erecting two Independent Treasury buildings, their "iron vaults and cells and lock;" these to be erected in large cities, where all our custom-houses have averaged from 500 to a million of dollars, the grand Independent Treasury building in this city, not yet complete, at a cost of over a million; and this expense is only the beginning, the entering wedge. Already, in this very bill, the Senate has raised the salaries of the principal sub-treasurers, or receivers general, as this bill denominates them. Sub-treasurers being a plain Republican name, did not sound well in the vocabulary of modern Democracy; the appellation receivers general, borrowed from a monarchy, sounds more pleasantly upon their ears. The machinery will go on enlarging and enlarging, and with enlargement a corresponding increase of expenditure ad infinitum. The President suppresses a single item of expense that must necessarily attach upon the passage of this bill, amounting to twice the sum of 60 000 dollars annually; I allude to the pension agencies. This branch of public service is now performed free of charge by individual agencies, receiving no other compensation but the use of the public money between the time of deposite with them and disbursement. I extorted this unwilling admission from the chairman of Ways and Means, in this discussion in the early part of this session, upon the pension bill. This bill makes it a penitentiary offence for any agent or officer of the Government of any kind to use in any way the public money. Instantly, upon the passage of this bill, these pension agents will resign. It is absurd to suppose that individuals will labor for the Government and find themselves, and assume heavy responsibilities, without compensation of some kind; they will resign, or you must give them a standing salary. Here, then, is an expense growing out of this measure of at least one hundred thousand dollars annually. There are additional expenses necessarily incident to this measure, considering it, as its friends describe, a mere fiscal machine for collecting, keeping, and disbursing the revenues. Here, then, after the erection of buildings, and all appurtenances of iron chests, safes, vaults, locks and keys, to which expense the bill affixes no limit, is an additional expense of two hundred thousand dollars annually, to conduct this Executive machinery, in its earliest simplicity, in its very origin. What will it cost in its manhood, in its full growth and maturity, God, in his infinite knowledge, only knows. I am now contrasting the expense with the State bank system. It is notorious to this committee and the country, that it cost the Government nothing while the State banks were used as depositories, either for collecting, keeping, or disbursing the public moneys, that they acted as pension agents without charge or reward. This additional expense of $200,000 annually, if there should be no enlargement of the scheme, no increase of expenditure, which is impossible, from the very nature of things, even if it be honestly and bona fide administered, the increase of wealth and population will require some increase of expenses annually. But suppose it to remain stationary, it will amount in the short space of twenty years—the life of the charter of the National Bank—to the enormous sum of four millions of dollars over the State bank system. But how does the comparison stand with the United States Bank? That institution, also, without charge, collected, kept, and disbursed the entire revenues of the Government for fifteen years, until she was forcibly arrested by the removal of the deposites, including the payments to all pensioners. But this was not all: in addition to this service, (and be it remembered not one farthing out of four hundred millions that passed through this Bank was lost to the Government,) this Bank paid one million and a half of dollars into the Treasury. Add this to the four millions above, and we have five millions and a half of dollars of additional expense in twenty years against the Independent Treasury, when compared with a United States Bank. One would suppose this sum ought to make any scheme a little "independent." But remember, this independence is all at the cost of the people. Surely this cannot be considered no slight objection, particularly at a crisis like this, when your Treasury is bankrupt, when we have exhausted the last dollar of our surplus, and have created a national debt of five millions, for the payment of which the property of my constituents and yours stand mortgaged and pledged. Where is the spirit of retrenchment and economy so much boasted of in the message, vauntingly displayed in almost every paragraph, so often repeated as to become disgusting to the taste? How does the practice tally with the professions upon this point, as all others, with the party in power? Their economy is like their Democracy, all from the teeth outwards: it never penetrates the skin, much less reach the heart; economists in precept, spendthrifts and prodigals in practice.

3d objection, its insecurity. I now come to a more important demerit of this measure as a financial scheme. Under this head I refer to the multiplied evidences I have already presented in the way of argument, authority, and tried experience; evidences taken from the State papers of the President and his Secretary, from the speeches of every distinguished supporter of this measure at this time. But in addition to this mass of testimony, testimony of itself sufficient to condemn this measure before any impartial tribunal, I now offer evidence of woful experience, during the three years' practical operation of this measure. From official documents furnished by the Secretary, and laid on our tables, the losses for the last three years, during the practical operation of the Independent Treasury, the Treasury has sustained a loss of $2.064,209, equal to nearly one half of the losses by collecting officers during every Administration from the foundation of the Government—forty-eight years.

Information by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The following items are extracts from a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the House of Representatives, in obedience to a resolution of that body calling on him for a statement of the annual expenditures and losses of the General Government, under each Administration, from 1789 to 1837:

Amount of defalcations in the first four years of Gen. Washington's administration $4,899
Second four years 32,723

‡Charleston and Cincinnati Railroad.

Compare the above with the list of defaulters under the present Administration, and it will be seen that within the last three years, the Government, under Martin Van Buren, has lost nearly one-half as much as was lost under all the previous Administrations for forty-eight years.

These exhibitions of moral delinquency and official peculation give me no pleasure; I refer to them more in sorrow than anger. But, sir, we are considering a grave measure, a measure of momentous magnitude o the weal or wo of the country; all the light within our reach should be brought to bear upon it; we are legislating for the future; we should draw our knowledge to guide us from the past; experience, I repeat it, is the mother of wisdom. In the table I have read, we discover a painful and rapid increase of the relaxation of public morals, since the open declaration in the Senate, that "to the victors belong the spoils." And is it not shocking, positively shocking, beyond all human endurance without getting into a passion, to read in the messages of the great chief of the party, acting under this banner flying to the winds for the last ten years, gathering the cormorants and vultures of all parties, the repeated denunciations of the moral delinquencies of the banking corporations and of the people? In his last message, after speaking of the pervading and abiding moral deficiency of banks and individuals, like the boasting Pharisee he exclaims, let others do as they may, it is incumbent upon us "to hold erect the principles of morality and law." Oh impudence unblushing! to use such an expression after repeated instances, in the exercise of the appointing power, of not only retaining in office notorious defaulters and peculators, but actually appointing to distinguished honor and foreign stations, convicted delinquents, convicted by their own acknowledgment, or by the report of committees of investigation, based upon sworn and indisputable testimony. Having made it one of his cardinal political maxims in appointments to high stations to select men rejected by the people of their immediate vicinage for the most humble State offices, going upon the modern Democratic principle that those whom the people condemn as worthy victims of popular disfavor, are fit subjects, in his estimation, of Executive patronage. Now, sir, if our Chief Magistrate would be advised by one so humble as myself, I would suggest to him a better guarantee for the security of the public moneys, and a safer prevention against future peculations, than all the iron safes, chests, bolts and bars, and locks and keys, that he can have manufactured in the next one hundred years, if every house in the country was a smith-shop, with a vulcan at every anvil; it is a simple machine; let the President go back to the standard of Jefferson—"is he honest, is he qualified?" If he will erect this "standard," and be guided by it in his appointments to office, take honest men with "fit qualifications," and he will be relieved from the trouble of grieving over the laxity of morals of banks, private citizens, or public officers, in a very great degree; explode the idea that party zeal and party devotion, and political defeat, is to be rewarded by office; teach the people that private and public integrity and virtue is the only passport to political preferment and station; and the deplorable state of public morals engendered by the spoils principle will be purified: public officers will be found, who will again discharge their duties to the country as they did in the purer days of the republic, unguarded by bolts and bars, unchecked by the severe penalties of law. Then, and not till then, shall we have faithful public agents, then, and not till then, shall our treasury escape the heavy peculations so repeatedly perpetrated upon it during this reign of the coalition of the two parties; one fighting in the North, with the banner unfurled, inscribed upon it, "to the victors belong the spoils;" in the South, the banner streaming in the wind, with this equally mercenary inscription, "the enurement of office."

It is a flimsy apology made for the heavy defalcations during this Administration, that the laws are insufficient. The same laws, the same safeguards, the same restrictions, are in force now as existed during any former Administration. There has been no repeal, no qualification, no removal of legal limitation. Another decided preference in favor of the superior security of the bank system over the Sub-Treasury, is this: private interest is always more watchful than public. The stockholders knowing their entire stock would be liable for any defalcation, would exercise a vigilance in proportion to the heavy responsibility. It is the security of interest, honest private interest, that wise legislation should look to for the safety of the public moneys, not to locks and keys, and not to oaths and penalties. Government officers at best, are a sleepy race of mortals. We read that the apples of Juno were guarded by a dragon with a hundred heads that never slept; and yet, they were stolen. Bars and bolts, and iron chests, and safes and locks, and keys of themselves, furnish no adequate security, unless a watchful eye and an honest incorruptible heart governs the arm and wields the hand that holds the key. Read not to me nor any common sense man a dissertation to prove, that because the vaults in the Sub-Treasury can be made as strong as the vaults in banks, that this is evidence of equal security. Insult not my understanding, by an argument to prove that security of the public moneys consists in inanimated matter. I spurn all such flummery as an insult to my understanding. It has been well said, that he was not an unwise or an unjust judge, of whom it is recorded, that—

"He sent the thief who stole the gold away,
And punished him who put it in his way."

Save us from temptation was a wise prayer, uttered by one who knew the infirmity of human nature. Is not the history of our country full of melancholy examples of the inability of honest men to resist strong temptation. Surely, it is not wise or just to place by our legislation temptations in men's way, that we know by constant and sad experience to be sufficient to overpower the positive enactments of law, consisting of the heaviest penalties—penalties of physical suffering and disgrace.

4th. Financial objection. Its tendency and direct effect to diminish the revenue. This is conceded, or rather it is claimed, as one of the virtues—one of its excellencies. Mr. Buchanan, of the Senate, in enumerating its specific benefits, says it will "diminish our imports after the year 1842." He then goes on to amplify upon this blessed result. Now, sir, that a Senator, from a middle State deeply engaged, (more deeply, when we calculate the various manufactures, than any other State in the Union,) should feel exultation and self-glorification, at this most benign influence, does not astonish me. But that extreme Southern gentleman, opposed to a high tariff, should be working shoulder to shoulder with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in support of a measure having the conceded effect to reduce our imports, does astonish me—does amaze me, at the very time it is argued and made manifest that our revenue from imports and lands will fall short five millions of defraying the ordinary expenses of the Government, "administered upon the most economical scale, consistent with a just regard to the public interest." Sir, let us look into this matter a little further, it is an important point, particularly it seems to me—it deserves the examination and consideration of Southern gentlemen. What does our Chief Magistrate say upon this topic? Courtesy requires we should always consult him first upon great questions of finance. In his annual message he uses this language: "The check lately given to importations of articles subject to duties—the arrangements in the operation of internal trade—and especially the reduction gradually taking place in our tariff of duties—all tend materially to lessen our receipts; indeed, it is probable the reduction resulting from the last cause alone will not fall short of five millions of dollars, in the year 1842, as the final reduction of all duties take place then." Now, just at this heavy crisis of diminution, the Senator from Pennsylvania, a high tariff man, wants to apply the pruning knife of the Independent Treasury, to cut down still lower the imports. But, again, from the message: "The whole revenue then accruing, both from customs and the sales of public lands, if not more, will undoubtedly be wanted to defray the necessary expenses of the Government, under the most prudent administration of its affairs." The lowest possible amount necessary to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government, according to the President and his Secretary, is twenty millions annually. The President says in his annual message: "I have directed the estimates for 1840 to be subjected to the severest scrutiny, and to be limited to the absolute requirements of the public service." If the President be correct in his calculation, with the exercise of the most rigid economy, the ordinary expenditures cannot be less annually than twenty-one millions, (though it will be remembered that thirteen millions during Mr. Adams's administration was pronounced by this very economist, in his celebrated retrenchment report of '26, as wasteful prodigality.) But more upon this point under its appropriate head. To pursue my argument, I now read a short extract from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon this point of necessary, ordinary expenditures: "But an expenditure of twenty millions for ordinary purposes, though much reduced from the aggregate during a few years past, is believed to be more, instead of less, than sound policy justifies, while the present annual embarrassment in moneyed affairs shall continue." (Mark the qualification in the last clause of the sentence.) The opinion of this strict economist, whilst the Government is borrowing money annually, at the rate of five per cent. interest, thereby creating and piling up a national debt every day and every hour as time rolls on, to meet the ordinary expenditures of this most economical Administration. This officer of finance thinks that perhaps even the curtailed and reduced sum of twenty millions, is more than sound policy justifies during "the present unusual embarrassment in moneyed affairs." And this officer acting under the peremptory order of the President, to limit his estimate for the year 1840, by the most rigid standard of economy, leaving out every expenditure of an extraordinary kind, omitting any appropriation for the Florida war, for the new organization of the militia, recommended by the Secretary of War, and is zealously endorsed by the President, omitting all expenditures of every sort that belong to the head of extraordinary expenditures, he still computes twenty millions, as indispensable to discharge the ordinary, necessary wants of the Government for the year 1840. To meet this estimate of expenses, the Secretary furnishes an estimate of income, of receipts from customs, fifteen millions—from lands three and a half millions. The residue is to be raised by borrowing upon Treasury notes at five per cent. or some other mode yet to be suggested and adopted.

We are also told by the same high authorities in the same State Papers, that the receipts from customs is gradually decreasing, and must decrease under the operation of the Compromise Act, until the year 1842, which operation, alone, the President says, will diminish the income from this source in that year, at least five millions; add this sum to the two millions, and in 1842, there will be a deficit in your Treasury, an annual deficit, of seven millions, independent of unexpected deficiencies, fluctuations, or extraordinary demands. This calculation is based upon the data of the President and his Secretary, and it is urged by one of the ablest advocates of this bill in the Senate, that one of the peculiar merits of this measure will be, further to diminish the customs in the year 1842. I ask the attention of Southern gentlemen, anti-tariff men, to this view of the subject—gentlemen who are supporting the party in power, who fix the minimum expenditure of this Government at twenty millions—gentlemen who support this measure, a measure that I have shown already will cost an annual sum of two hundred thousand dollars, besides a heavy outlay to begin operations. How is this deficiency to be raised? I address myself to Southern anti-tariff Van Buren men. Sir, there is but two ways, and you sir, nor any other supporter of this Administration shall escape this dilemma. I repeat, sir, there are but two ways, an increased tariff, or direct taxes. And no one I presume would dare propose this substitute. I call upon Southern planters, not Southern politicians, to pause and consider this view of the subject. That this scheme should be a favorite measure with Administration politicians in the Middle and Northern States, where a high tariff is popular, is not surprising. It is all natural enough. But that any sage Southern statesman should not perceive its effects upon his section of the country, is to me marvellous. But sir, such is the power of party delusion; we daily see the wisest heads intoxicated into political madness and phrenzy—reason loses her balance, all common sense vanishes. As I am addressing this part of my argument to the South particularly, I desire to make my proof full and complete—it is an important point in the case. In addition then to the above authorities, I offer another authority of weight with a portion of this house and this nation. I read from the speech of Mr. Calhoun, delivered this session, on the assumption of State debts: "I need not inform the Senate there is not a surplus cent in the Treasury; that the most rigid economy will be necessary to meet the demands on it the present year; that the revenue, so far from being on the increase, must be rapidly reduced, under existing laws, in the next two years." Here is confirmation of the views of the President and Secretary. With these admissions and facts before him, can any candid and impartial man resist the conclusion, that the direct effect of this measure must be to unite, with other causes, in demanding an increase of duties on imports—plain reason suggests it, boasted acknowledgments admit it; who can doubt it? none but the wilfully blind, blind because they will not see, or seeing, tied by party chains, have not the candor nor the public virtue to admit, to their constituents, the true effects and evils of this measure. I here close my argument upon this point, leaving it to some Southern opponent of this bill to do it more ample justice.

6. I now approach a still more important specific financial objection to this bill; its tendency and direct effect to increase the expenditures of Government. This point presents a grave financial question—it requires a full examination—it is vital to the merits of this bill—fortunately on this point we have the light of experience. This scheme, as I have conclusively shown, has been in practical operation during the existence of this Administration, in the hands of its authors and friends, to aid it in a successful trial. With the Executive and an overwhelming majority at least in one branch of Congress, without whose assent no appropriation for expenditure could be made, with all these propitious advantages, so favorable to a successful result, what are the facts? I deal not in vapid declamation upon this point, no conjecture, no speculation—the matter is too serious for this, it is a question of facts and cold figures; by facts and figures I propose to try it: then for the facts and figures.

I shall test the practical effect of this measure upon the expenditures in various ways, so there may be no apology, no excuse, no escape. I shall contrast the Government expenditures during the reign of this Administration, and the existence of this scheme, with the same number of years of Mr. Adams's administration, pronounced by Mr. Van Buren in 1827, to be prodigal in the extreme. And 1st, I will show how the comparison stands—of aggregate expenditures independent of the payment of public debt of any kind, redemption of Treasury notes or Government liabilities of any sort. I read from the official statement furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to the resolutions of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] this session, bearing date May 7th, 1840, the identical document relied upon by the friends of this Administration to vindicate its economy; upon this record I take issue and risk my objection under this head of my argument—now for the figures.

Adams.	Aggregate expenditures of the first three years of Adams's administration, independent of public debt.	Van Buren.	Aggregate expenditures of the first three years of Van Buren's administration, independent of public debt.
1824	$15,330,114	1837	$37,243,214
1825	11,490,459	1838	33,849,718
1826	13,062 3.6	1839	25,282,797
	$39,882,919		$97,065,729
			39,882,919
			$57,192,810
Adams.	Aggregate amount of expenditures during Mr. Adams's administration, three first years, for permanent and ordinary purposes, including payments on account of objects either extraordinary or temporary.	Van Buren.	Aggregate amount of expenditures during Mr. Van Buren's administration, three first years, for permanent and ordinary purposes, excluding payments on account of objects either extraordinary or temporary.
1824	$7,107,892	1837	$13,096 321
1825	6,537,671	1838	13 837,494
1826	7,058,872	1838	13,325,800
	$20,704,435		$40,861,615
			$20,157,180

The last comparison includes none of the following items; such as the public debt, trust funds, indemnities, claims of State for war debts, or three per cents on lands sold; occasional donations in money to objects in the District of Columbia, or otherwise; survey of the coast; taking the census; duties refunded; exploring expedition; and materials collected for the gradual improvement of the navy, (including improvements at navy yards,) durable public buildings of all kinds; bridges and fortifications; all roads, canals, breakwaters, and improvements in rivers and harbors; arming the militia and forts; all pensions except those to invalids; and the purchase of title to lands from Indians, (Indian Department;) the removal of Indians, and the wars; with such other payments as may have been made in those years for property lost, or injuries committed, during any hostilities. None of these years or columns include any thing on account of the Post Office Department.

NOTE.—The expenditures for 1842 are subject to variation on the settlement of the Treasurer's accounts for that year, which have not yet reached this office.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Register's Office, May 4, 1840.
T. L. SMITH, Register.

Now, sir, I have been reading from a table, prepared for the express purpose of meeting and refuting the charge of wasteful and prodigal expenditure upon the part of this Administration. The first comparison shows an excess of $57,192,810. The second comparison shows an excess of $29,157,180. The last showing an expense of double, in the first treble, the sum in Mr. Van Burens's three years over Mr. Adams's, neither including a single one of the many items embraced in the bill of exceptions just read. These are the facts, the undisputed and indisputable figures. What explanation, what apology, what what excuse, can be given for this excess, this enormous excess? Why, sir, various, but unsatisfactory. Amongst others, it is contended that the increase of "wealth and population" demands and justifies this vast increase of expenditure. Is this so? I must resort to figures to test this apology; we must consult the lights of experience to test the validity of this excuse. How has it been during other Administrations, when population and wealth were equally progressive, all other things being equal? I will take a period of eight successive years, embracing the four years of Mr. Adams's administration, and the four first years of Gen. Jackson's, and we will see how the matter stands.

Adams.	Aggregate expenditure without funded debt.	Expenditure for permanent and ordinary purposes only.	Jackson.	Aggregate expenditure without funded debt.	Expenditure for permanent and ordinary purposes.
1824	$15,330,144	$7,107,892	1828	$13,296,041	$7,788,394
1825	11,490,459	6,537,671	1829	12,660,460	7,624,827
1827	12,653,095	7,427,175	1831	13,864,067	7,503,204

Here we have the expenditures for eight successive years, embracing the "wasteful administration" of Mr. Adams, showing an increase under one head of only a few hundred thousand, and under the other an actual diminution of over one million. This exhibit, I think, explodes this apology of our learned Secretary and retailers on this floor. What next; why, when you block the argument by these figures, that cannot be explained away or contradicted, gentlemen say, we challenge you for the items of extravagance; we demand specifications; give us the bill of particulars. Give the items! Take up the Blue Book of the Republic, which corresponds with the "red book of monarchies," (as was said in the celebrated report upon retrenchment and reform of 1816, made by Van Buren, Benton and Co.) and read the astounding fact that then, when the Government was pronounced by this committee rotten to the core with prodigality, the number of collecting officers in New York was only 174, and the amount of their salaries $119,620 39, and that now, in the third year of the economical reign of Mr. Van Buren, the number of officers to perform the same duty is 497, and their annual salaries $566,615 92. In the emphatic language of this committee, "the Blue Book of the Republic is indeed a growing little volume;" and "still this is a mere proving of Executive patronage in the city of New York," say this committee. Take up the report of the Secretary, laid on our table February 17, 1839, containing a statement each year, from 1789 to 1837, of the cost of collection of customs, and the rate of per cent. the cost of collection bore to the value of imports, and also the payments into the Treasury, and read the figures, showing the amazing fact that, in 1826, the cost of collection of all the customs was only $880,999 18, and that in 1837, with a smaller amount of duties to be collected, it amounted to the enormous sum of $1,492,974, an increase in ten years double of the increase from 1789 (it being then $239,541 03,) to 1826, a space of thirty-seven years. The rate of per cent. on payments into the Treasury in 1826, 3 66—in 1837, 11 79; almost 400 per cent. in ten years, whilst the rate of per cent. in 1826 was one per cent. less than in 1789. The same table shows the rate of per cent. of imports in 1826 to be 1.04; in 1837, 1.05. So these figures prove, with no increase of business, in fact a falling off of business, the number of officers have increased in ten years from 174 to 497; that the cost of salaries of officers, for no more labor, has increased from $117,6 0 39 to $566,615 92; and that the per centage on collection has risen from 3.66 in 1826, to 11.79 in 1837.

Sir, I could continue this bill of particulars until it would make a volume larger than the Blue Book; but I will not recapitulate the specifications already presented by others; nor will I weary the committee by adding a fresh list. Sir, enumerate item upon item, specification after specification, until the heart of a plain American citizen sickens at the contemplation of oriental grandeur and extravagance of this self-styled Democratic dynasty, aping after royal fashion, and you are instantly met with the cry, this is invidious, malignant. But, Mr. Chairman, when all other champions fail, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. MCKAY] comes in to the rescue, and, Atlas-like, shoulders the charge of extravagant expenditure, and boasts he can carry it triumphantly. And how does he undertake the defence? By denying any of the figures I have read? No, sir; he admits the expenditures, but pleads to the jurisdiction—denies Executive responsibility.

Sir, I propose very briefly to analyze this defence of expenditures, this labored and somewhat spurious defence of the Administration upon this charge of extravagance. This notice is due to the high position that that gentleman holds in the ranks of his party, being considered their Ajax Telamon, when there is any cyphering to be done; particularly when it becomes necessary to use the new rule in Arithmetic, denominated 'reduction ascending," to rescue this Administration from an inextricable difficulty. His plea to the jurisdiction under this indictment for wasteful prodigality, is, that the Executive is not responsible for any increase of expenditure. Now, sir, neither admitting nor denying the validity of this plea, I enter replication: that Mr. Van Buren is estopped by his bond from offering any such plea in his behalf, either by himself or attorney. I intend to try him by his own standard; on the gallows erected for Mordecai I intend, Haman-like, he shall hang. He, in his high official character of Senator, in 1826, acting under the obligations of sworn duty, arraigned Mr. Adams upon a similar charge, before a similar tribunal. In vain did he, through his advocates, plead no Executive responsibility; in vain did they say, "the Executive could originate no laws," "could pass no appropriations," "could not take a dollar from your Treasury without law." These pleas, now so pathetically and feelingly made, were then ruled out of court by Judge Van Buren, with his associate justices, Benton and Co. presiding. Truly has it been said, retributive justice will surely come, sooner or later it will come. And in this instance, there is a remarkable coincidence, Mr. Chairman, in the lapse of time, between the deed and the visitation of justice, with another that transpired many centuries since.

In ancient history, we read of a tyrant of Agrigentum, who made use of the most excruciating torments to punish his subjects on the smallest suspicion. Perrillus, one of his subjects, made him a brazen bull, and when he had presented it to Phaleris, the tyrant ordered the inventor to be seized, and the first experiment to be made on his body. These cruelties did not remain long unrevenged; the people of Agrigentum revolted in the 10th year of his reign, and put him to death precisely in the same manner as he had tortured Perillus and many of his subjects after him. These examples of retributive justice should be preserved in history as monuments of terror to tyrants, as evidence of God's eternal justice to martyrs—to patriots. Yes, sir, he that was broken upon the brazen bull of Executive responsibility for Government expenditures in '29, will live to see the inventor of the infernal machine writhing in March 1841, under the grinding feet of his own cruel device. Now to the analysis of the defence of the gentleman from North Carolina, and considering he hails from "Old Rip Van Winkle," he has made more progress in refined notions than any plain, unsophisticated Southern man I have any acquaintance with. The President is said to be a magician, and likely his association has been of the familiar kind with him. The talismanic art is quite communicative. His next defence is, "The money was in the Treasury and it must be expended." This is his own language; this is new doctrine, although we are told there is nothing new under the sun. The gentleman is entitled to the conception of originality; this excuse possesses that quality if no other. Congress, in its wisdom, has devised another mode, besides wasteful extravagance, to deplete an overflowing Treasury It seems strange that so recent an example should have escaped the gentleman's memory. A remedy for a surplus Treasury quite as successful, as wasteful extravagance, and infinitely more beneficial in its effects, though in this debate this wise and most provident measure has not escaped the ruthless hand of assault. Time will not allow, or I would gladly review some of the "unmeaning bombast" that stunned my ears only a few days since from the opposite side of this hall [alluding to the gentleman from New York, Mr. VANDERPOEL] on this topic. Not content with making a defence for the Administration, the gentleman from North Carolina has thought fit to carry the war into Africa, and assault the Opposition, charging upon them the authorship of this surplus, which imposed the indispensable duty on the Administration to expend it, whether profitable or not to the nation. He charged the surplus to the tariff of '28, and that the Opposition were high tariff men and had passed that measure, that bill of abominations. I take issue upon both of these points, and as his speech is intended for Southern consumption, and as its bold assertion and ad captandum phrases may mislead many who have not looked into the facts, I will investigate these points a little. I have already by a table exploded the first idea, that the surplus arose from the tariff, and I will now explode the second notion, that the Opposition are responsible for the tariff of '28, not by assertions such as the gentleman has resorted to, but by testimony and corroborating facts that he will not deny when I present them. Testimony that he will not question the credibility of. I charge back upon the gentleman that Mr. Van Buren was the instrument that caused the passage of the tariff bill of '28, and but for his influence, intrigue, management and vote, that bill of "abominations" would have failed, would not have become a law. This I know, is considered a bold assertion. I see Southern men pricking their ears; it even wakes you up, Mr. Chairman, "monument of patience smiling at grief," as you are, or seem to be. I see it depicted in your countenance, this cannot be; hold, do not commit yourselves prematurely; hear the facts before you enter judgment, lest you may be compelled suddenly to review your opinion, however unwilling, however reluctant, however painful. To the testimony—I first call the Hon. J. C. Calhoun to the witness stand, a witness of high credibility with the accused. I read from his speech delivered in the Senate of the United States in the year 1837, on the bill proposing the reduction of the tariff. Speaking of the tariff of 1828, in the progress of his remarks, he says: "Have you forget the tariff of 1828, that bill of abominations, so execrated by the South, and which has brought so many disasters upon the country? I have, [looking at SILAS WRIGHT, Senator from New York,] its author in my eyes, and he knows the fact. He knows the part he bore in the passage of that act, and the means by which it was effected. It was passed by a breach of faith; we were deceived then, it will not by my fault if we be deceived again." Shortsighted man, how little thou knowest of the future—supremely ignorant of thy own future thoughts and actions. "Know thyself" was a wise maxim, though spoken by a heathen. This is a lamentable proof of its profound philosophy, with volumes of woful experience of treachery and infidelity, public and private, before the eyes of this boasting statesmen. Themistocles, the political exile returns to the embraces of the son of Alcmeon, the dupe, a second time, of him, who has once deceived and betrayed the South. Again, in same speech: "The tariff of '28 was as much a political movement as a measure of protection. The protective policy had triumphed in Congress by the passage of the tariff act of '24. [Voted for by Mr. Van Buren without instruction.] Emboldened by this success, an attempt was made in the session of '26-7 to increase the duty on wool and woollens, which was rejected by my casting vote as presiding officer of this body. A combined movement was then made by the manufacturing interests which met at Harrisburg, and agreed on a new tariff. This movement was understood to have the countenance of the then Administration. In the mean time, the anti-tariff interest of the South had selected Gen. Jackson as their candidate against Mr. Adams for the Presidency. His principal strength in the tariff States lay in Pennsylvania, New York and Ohio. They were thoroughly in favor of the protective system, and his supporters then were not a little alarmed at the movement at Harrisburg. The battle was to be fought in Congress. On the meeting of Congress, [Mr. ADAMS's administration proved to be in a minority,] Mr. Stevenson was elected Speaker, (now Minister at St. James,) and then, as now, a devoted friend to the President elect. (Mark this paragraph, Mr. Chairman; I ask your especial attention, as every other member from Virginia; it is pregnant with truth upon this much misunderstood point.) It was apparent that the movement of the session would be governed by the tariff question, and the Committee on Manufactures was so organized as to give the control to the friends of Mr. Van Buren in the Middle and Western States. Mr. Mallory, who had long been chairman, was continued. Mr. Wright, present chairman of Finance in this body, then a member of the other House, and Mr. Moore, of Kentucky, afterwards Minister to Colombia, and Mr. Stephenson, of Pittsburg, were placed on the committee, who, with one member from the South, gave a majority against Mr. Adams's administration. Representing, as this committee did, the interests of the Middle and Western States, which were thoroughly tariff, they reported a bill with much higher rates than the Harrisburg project. The bill passed the House, but in so obnoxious a form to the New England States, that a large portion of their representatives joined those of the South in voting against it. When sent to the Senate, it was soon ascertained that in this body, where the Southern and Eastern States had a much larger representation in proportion, there was a decided majority against it in the form it came from the House. Every New England Senator, with the exception of one or two, was understood to be decidedly opposed; and relying on the assurance on which our friends acted in the House, we anticipated with confidence and joy that the bill would be defeated, and the whole system overthrown by the shock. Our hopes were soon blasted. A certain individual, then a Senator, but recently elected to the highest office in the Union, [M. Van Buren,] was observed to assume a mysterious air in relation to the bill. The mystery was explained when the bill came up to be acted upon. I will not give in detail his course. It is sufficient to say that, instead of resisting amendments, as we had a right to expect, he voted for all that were necessary to secure the votes of New England; particularly the amendments to raise the duties on woollens. All these amendments, with one or two exceptions, were carried by his votes, as appears from the journal now on my table."

In corroboration of this evidence, I will give a short extract or two from the speeech of Mr. Van Buren, delivered at Albany, New York, 10th of July, 1827, at a tariff convention, the summer previous to the passage of the famous bill of 1828. The occasion of the speech was this, as appears from its contents: During the preceding session of Congress—that of 1826, '7—the celebrated woollens bill was introduced into the Senate, Mr. Van Buren being a member, and near the close of the session, the bill was laid on the table, Mr. Van Buren not voting. The friends of the bill charged him with designedly "dodging" the question. To clear himself of this charge, he appears before the Albany tariff convention, and made a speech in favor of protection throughout. In that speech he says:

"It will not be necessary for the purpose of the present discussion, to go further back than the tariff of 1824. At that time he had the honor of a seat in the Senate of the United States, and had given the tariff of that year a decided support. The Senate was so equally divided, his vote might have defeated the bill."

I will not weary the committee by reading the entire speech. It is full of tariff—tariff, and nothing but tariff—teeming with protection—protection—protection—concluding with this memorable and characteristic passage:

"He owed many thanks to the meeting for the very kind attention with which he had been listened to by gentlemen, between many of whom and himself there had, upon public matters, been differences of opinion of long standing. His situation in reference to the wool-growing interest was well known to most of them. He had at present invested more than $20,000 in sheep and farms, devoted to that interest. He felt all proper concern for his own interest, and of course would cheerfully unite in all suitable measures for its advantage."

I here close my proof on this point. In view of the facts I have brought to the attention of the committee, it would seem impossible for any sincere inquirer after truth to resist the conviction that to Mr. Van Buren and the party now in power, and not to the Opposition, belong the evil of palming upon the country the tariff act of 1828. This bill of abominations, as it is termed, to which the South Carolina Senator, in his late speech in the Senate, has traced all the evils, and distress, and ruin, with which this devoted country has been afflicted for the last twelve years, omitting altogether in that speech (no doubt unintentionally) going into the origin of that act, its history, its authors.

There is one other argument in defence of the wasteful expenditures of the Administration, advanced by the honorable gentleman from North Carolina. It is in the nature of a plea of set off. Technically, this plea can never be filed in suit, except previous notice has been given. As the gentleman is engaged in the support of a bad cause, I am not disposed to resort to technicalities even to combat sophistry. Well, sir, what is the set off? The argument is this: "That during the past Administration, no new duties have been laid, but that a great many duties had been repealed, amounting in the period of time between the years 1831 and 1836, to one hundred and seventeen millions of dollars, in round numbers, making an actual reduction in the burdens on the people of these amounts." This is the argument of the honorable gentleman, in his own figures and words. This is a heavy item—a large sum—and if it should turn out to be a just credit, it settles the difficulty at once—the defence is complete—it is more than complete—Mr. Van Buren is entitled to a judgment for over six millions, for the amount saved exceeds his entire gross expenditures, that being only the reduced sum of one hundred and eleven millions in three years. Now, sir, strange as it would seem to any candid, sober-minded man, that such a declaration as this would merit a serious reply, yet, such is the reign of humbuggery at this day in this country, that this ridiculous absurdity, this flimsy sophism, is one of the stereotyped defences and boasts of the party in power. You find it for the first time in the Message of 1835; it is repeated in the speech of Mr. Hill of New Hampshire, of the Senate, in 1836; it is reasserted in this speech of the candid gentleman from North Carolina, this session; it is enlarged upon in the Democratic address at Baltimore. You see, sir, it is a favorite idea with the self-styled Democracy: it deserves some consideration, some examination, chaffy as it is when sifted, bubble as it will prove to be, when pierced by the spear of truth. Now, sir, the first objection I have to the validity of this set off, pleading to its merits, is, that I cannot see what right the gentleman has to take acts of General Jackson's administration and apply them in defence of Mr. Van Buren. 2d. According to the argument in the foregoing part of the gentleman's remarks, neither General Jackson, Mr. Van Buren, or any other President, is entitled to any credit or responsibility or blame for the expenditures, increase of burdens, or diminution of burdens. I will give his own language: "The gentlemen in the Opposition, in their desire to throw the responsibility of the increase of expenditures upon the Executive Department of the Government, lose sight of the fact that the President cannot originate money bills, or add any thing to the burdens of the appropriations, or take from them." 3d. This reduction was effected, as the honorable gentleman contends, by the operation of the compromise act. The argument is this: but for the modification of the tariff of 1828, by the passage of the compromise act of 1833, the duties would have amounted to one hundred and seventeen millions of dollars more than in the period before named; ergo, by this enormous reduction, the burdens of the people have been lessened one half; and for this kind favor, General Jackson is first entitled to credit, and then, by way of imputation, Mr. Van Buren is to come in for a full benefit. It is a broad shield, that can cover the spendthrift prodigality of both these Administrations. The whole argument proceeds upon an assumed hypothesis—an if, technically upon what logicians call a begging of the question, to get to the conclusion, which was this: "Provided the imposts had been as heavy during the seven years above named, the act of 1828, in the meantime, remaining unaltered." Now, sir, this proviso surrenders the whole argument—it cuts off the set off close by the roots. Every body knows, who knows any thing of the nature of our commerce, that had the tariff of 1828 continued in full force until 1837, our imports would have been greatly less than they were under the modification of the act of 1828, and the compromise of 1833. 4th objection. To the argument growing out of this plea of set off, neither General Jackson nor Mr. Van Buren is entitled to the credit of any reduction of taxes or burdens springing from the compromise act. It originated in no recommendation of theirs—no hand of theirs drew the bill—no head of theirs dictated—no heart of theirs prompted its conception—it was forced upon them both against their will—it received their cold and reluctant sanction. Sir, permit me to say to the gentleman from North Carolina, steal not the livery that belongs to another, to hide the deformity of your party—give tribute to whom tribute is due—give unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's—strip not the author of that measure of his just honor, who alone of all other men in this Confederacy, has had the peculiar good fortune of being the instrument of saving this Republic in every trying exigency, for the last quarter century—him, who, upon more than one occasion, when his country was shaking to its centre, standing upon the verge of civil war—party billows rolling over the topmast of the Constitution, tossing it to and fro, by his genius, his sagacity, his powers of persuasion, his patriotism, his moral courage, poured oil on the agitated waves. The troubled sea was calmed, the ship of State was restored to its original moorings, her sails again unfurled to the breeze, without a single stripe stained, or a single star blotted out. But, sir, this statesman needs not my poor eulogy—his fame is identified with the history of his country for the last thirty years—his impress is upon every measure connected with its prosperity during that eventful period. His indignant vero is marked upon every act of usurpation. Whenever that history is written by an impartial pen, his fame will fill its brightest pages. When read, his memory will receive the first homage of the patriot's heart in every country, and every clime.

I close upon this head. The labored argument of the gentleman from North Carolina, also of the chairman of Ways and Means, Mr. Jones, from Virginia, going into a specification of extraordinary expenditures, all falls to the ground, when it is seen that in the comparison I have instituted, every item enumerated by them, and furnished as apologies and explanations by the enormous increase, is excepted in the calculation.

Now come, Mr. Chairman, to the consideration of the miscellaneous objections. It is a measure of favoritism, of bounty to the office holders—the tax receivers, and a measure of unequal and oppressive exaction upon the people—the tax payers. The President perceiving this incontestable and natural effect of the scheme, so obvious to the common understanding and common sense of the plainest farmer in the land, in his special message of 1837, he labors to mystify and evade this just objection, by a flimsy cobweb disguised argument. The President seeing that the effect of the scheme would be to create two distinct species of currency in the country—the baser currency for the use of the people—and the better currency for the dear office holders—himself being chief of the clan, at the tune of $25,000 in hard money—equal—under the operation of the Sub-Treasury system, to the increased sum of $2,500, as a premium on the currency of the people, making his salary in fact the sum of $27,500, instead of the sum fixed by the Constitution. Oh, modern Democracy! Thou art a selfish virtue. The President to secure this additional amount to his annual salary, without any imputation of selfish speculation, brings all his powers of ingenuity and sophistry into requisition, to prove that so far from its being a matter of favor to the office holders to receive nothing but hard money, that it is actually a restriction—"limitation upon the Government—no unjust measure of discrimination." This is the argument, rather the assertion of the President. A handsome compliment to the intelligence of Congress—to the intelligence of the people. It is only necessary to state the proposition, to refute it—it falls stillborn by its pregnant and flagrant absurdity. The measure is one of "restriction," yes, of double "restriction." It is true, it restricts the tax gatherer and the office holder to one currency, but that currency happens to be gold and silver; the better currency at a premium of from five to twenty-five per cent over the currency of the people; at the same time it restricts the tax payer to one currency, in the discharge of his dues to Government, and that currency is gold and silver. I ask our people loving President, where the oppression—grinding exaction of the "restrictive feature" of the scheme pinches? On whom does it fall? On the Government? No, sir. On the office holders? No, sir; it falls upon the dear people, whom the President and his clique have so tender a regard for, whose whole employment, by night and by day, is devotedly engaged in devising plans to save them from self-ruin, if professions of kindness are worth any thing. Sir, I will not labor the argument on this point of cruel and relentless "restriction," not upon the office holders as the President contends, but upon the people. A measure of unjust discrimination and favor, not to the people, but to the office holders. It seems to me every tax payer who is not as blind as snakes in dog days, is ready to exclaim: good Lord! save me from such Executive benevolence, such friendships, such favoritism. He will say it may be sport to you, Mr. President, in the language of frogs in the fable to the boys, but it is death to me. Sir, the proposition is too ridiculous to receive grave argument, it reflects contempt upon the intelligence of the people—a contempt that should be rebuked, and it should be cast back in the teeth of its author with scorn and derision, and in the name of my constituents, I cast it back, as disrespectful to their understanding—to their common sense—to their intelligence.

Again, I object to this measure, because of its direct tendency to reduce the price of labor and domestic products of every kind. In the midst of the political mania that has seized the brain of a certain portion of the friends of this measure, so far from considering the first branch of this objection as entitled to any weight, it is urged, boasted of, as one of its virtues. These Sub-Treasury orators, whilst they were straining their ingenuity to satisfy the manufacturers that their scheme would be the great desideratum they had been seeking so long, to guard them against foreign competition, did not perceive that this argument was a two edged sword, until it was seized by the Opposition, and its deformity exposed and held up to the burning indignation of the laboring class. The argument in a nutshell was this. Pass the Sub-Treasury, it will curtail the currency, thereby diminishing the measure of values of all kind—the price of labor—the price of cotton—the price of all products, that are necessary ingredients of manufactured articles. Therefore, it is said to the manufacturer, if the raw material is reduced the price of labor is reduced—the price of all bread stuffs, and meats reduced; the consequence is irresistible, that you can afford to sell the manufactured article just so much cheaper in competition with the foreign manufacturer in this country, or in a foreign market. The process of reasoning is strictly logical, it is irrefutable. This is building up the manufacturer, the large capitalist very snugly; but it is at the expense and ruin of the hard handed laborer in the employment of the capitalist—of the hard working farmer who earns his support in sun and in rain by the sweat of his brow. Time will not permit, and I fear the patience of the committee, nor my own strength will allow, or I would read extracts from the speeches of three distinguished leading supporters of this scheme, delivered during this session, distinctly taking this ground. I allude to Mr. Walker of Mississippi, Mr Calhoun of South Carolina, and Mr. Buchanan of Pennsylvania. Any gentleman who doubts whether I have misrepresented the argument of these gentlemen, can satisfy themselves by reference to the speeches. I have them on my table before me, free for inspection. I know, sir, one of these distinguished gentlemen, weeks after his speech went to the press and to the country, and weeks after the reply of the Hon. Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] exposing and laying bare the horrid argument, the gentleman, after waking up from his delusion, or after perhaps being waked up by communications from some hard working laborer, undertook to explain and recant himself out of the difficulty. But, sir, like the animal in the Serbonian bog, every kick he made, the deeper he sunk. And to borrow his own figure, the gentleman from Massachusetts, in despite of explanation, recantation or equivocation, fixed the argument upon him and there it will stick "like the shirt of Nessus," so long as his memory has a for honor or infamy. No escape. Partisans and politicians may pretend satisfaction, but the plain laboring, hard working man will hold him to it, will not be bullied or wheedled out of his common sense. But, sir, it did not require the acknowledgment of these distinguished gentleman to establish this point; it was a point settled by three years' woful experience. This measure having been in actual practical operation for three years past, its effects are not speculative, not conjectural. It is in vain now to say, in the language of the official organ, "The Sub-Treasury is not in force now, nor has it been; pass this bill and the safety and deliverance of the people instantly ensues." You can't gull this community with such humbuggery any longer. Labor has fallen—all farming products have fallen—cotton has fallen, all at least one-half. The people see it; they ask not of politicians to tell them of these things, that are open to their senses. They feel and see another most beneficent effect of the practical operation of this measure; whilst the price of their labor is reduced one-half, the price of all foreign necessaries of life, such as tea, coffee, and sugar, retain their former high prices. They see another thing—whilst they are reduced to want and beggary, the office holder receives his full salary. It was wisely written by the father of his country, in a letter, which I hold in my hand, to Gen. Knox in 1787: "It is among the evils, and perhaps not the smallest, of Democratical Governments, that the people must always feel before they will see. When this happens, they are roused to action. Hence it is that those kinds of Governments are always slow." Deep sagacity, profound statesmanship, proven by woful experience. The people have long felt the evils of the present Administration; thank God, they now begin to see this clearly and distinctly, and they are determined to remedy them by wise and energetic action, so soon as the forms of the Constitution will suffer them to make the application. Yes, sir, that which was speculation in 1837 is now history, that which was theory is now practical demonstration.

I propose now, Mr. Chairman, briefly to notice the effects of this measure upon the currency and commerce of the country, and particularly to analyze the views of the President upon this branch of the subject; for at last the arguments in this House, as well as in the other branch, upon this bill, are but copies or paraphrases of the arguments to be found in the various messages of the President. Now, sir, what is the argument of the President upon these two points? It is perfectly see-saw. He sets out by denying the power of the General Government, under the grants of the Constitution, to pass any acts for the regulation of the exchanges, for the relief of the embarrassments of the people, or interfering or aiding the ordinary operations of commerce in any way. I give his own language, special message 1837: "If, therefore, I refrain from suggesting to Congress any specific plan for regulating the exchanges of the country, relieving the operations of foreign or domestic commerce, it is from a conviction that such measures are not within the constitutional province of the General Government." Again: "All communities are apt to look to Government for too much." The President then sums up the powers of the General Government, "as he now understands them," (not as he understood them in 1836, when he wrote his famous electioneering letter to my colleague, S. Williams,) over both commerce and currency, in this short sentence: "In the mean time it is our duty to provide all the remedies against a depreciated paper currency, which the Constitution enables us to afford." Again, in his message of 1839: "The direct supervision of the banks belongs, from the nature of our Government, to the States who authorize them. It is to their Legislatures that the people must mainly look for action on that subject." Again: "The commerce and currency of the country are suffering evils from the operation of State banks which cannot and ought not to be overlooked; while the keeping of the public revenue in a separate and independent Treasury, and of collecting it in gold and silver, will have a salutary influence on the system of paper credit." Here, then, in these few brief extracts, we have the theory of the President defining his constitutional powers, and describing the effect of this measure upon commerce and the currency. The modus operandi is given in other clauses of the message. When the President wishes to give importance to this scheme, by showing its powerful agency in effecting a salutary check upon the over-issues of banks, he uses this language: "By using specie only in its transactions, the Government would create a demand for it which would, to a great extent, prevent its exportation, and by keeping it in circulation, maintain a broader and safer basis for the paper currency." When the objection is pressed upon the President, that his scheme will bear unreasonably upon the banks, cause distrust in their solvency, require a sudden and ruinous curtailment of their circulation, unsettle the mixed standard of values, depress the price of property, diminish the means of the debtor to discharge his debt, add doubly to the wealth of the creditor by the enhanced value of money, growing out of the difference in the amount of circulation between the time when the debt is contracted and when the debt falls due, make the rich richer and the poor poorer; oh, he says, this is all a mistake, this is all Whig "panic." Hear him in his own language, and see with what financial skill and sagacity, and accuracy of calculation, he explodes all these fanciful objections. I read now from his message of 1837, called session: "It is, however, a mistaken impression that any large amount of specie is required for public payments. Of the seventy or eighty millions now estimated to be in the country, ten millions would be abundantly sufficient for that purpose." If in addition to this consideration you look, he says, "at the facilities which will arise from enabling the Treasury to satisfy the public creditors by its drafts or notes, receivable in payment of the public dues, it may safely be assumed that no motive of convenience to the citizen requires the reception of bank paper by the Government." But, sir, permit me to read a revised view of this opinion, to be found in the last annual message, after three years of deep financial study, and "sober second thought" upon this point, and admire the display of sagacity manifested by our Chief Magistrate in the accuracy with which he guessed at the amount of specie that would be necessary under his "untried expedient"—the Independent Treasury—to conduct the finances of the Government: "These objections have been greatly exaggerated; from the best estimates we may safely fix the amount of specie in the country at eighty-five millions of dollars, and the portion of that which would be employed at any one time, in the receipts and disbursements of the Government would not, it is now ascertained, if the change was made at once, after full investigation, exceed four or five millions." And such, he says, is the rapidity with which the money passes in and out of the Treasury, so rapid is the evolution, "that of nearly twenty millions of dollars paid to collectors and receivers during the present year, the average amount in their hands at any one time did not exceed one million and a half; and of the fifteen millions received by the collector at New York during the present year, the average amount held by him at any given time has been less than half a million." What harmony of statements; in one moment this scheme is to work miracles by its demand for specie, stop the exportation, curtail the over-issues of banks, enlarge the amount of gold and silver, make the paper currency sounder and safer, a machine of most beneficent and efficacious potency; an objection is raised; the statement is instantly changed; its operation will be so light, so easy, its requisition for silver and gold so small, that its effect will not be felt in the remotest degree, even if the sudden demand for the entire revenue were made at once in specie, but especially when modified by the demand for only one-fourth, that to be gradually increased at one-fourth per year for four years; and in addition to all this, the mollifying operation of using Treasury "drafts and notes."

This double dealing, this blowing hot and cold with the same breath, betrays on the part of the President a vacillation of judgment, or a facility of tergiversation, either of which is of itself sufficient to destroy all respect for his opinions, and greatly to shake the public confidence in his declarations, as well as the purity of his motives, even upon the most grave and vital questions. Sir, the Chief Magistrate, in his reveries of gold and silver delusions, has fallen into another most egregrious financial mistake, no doubt without mature reflection; perhaps warped somewhat in his judgment by an over-anxiety to sustain a favorite scheme; he has, with a rapidity of thought amounting to intuition, rushed to the hasty and erroneous conclusion that all our revulsions in trade and fluctuations in currency are clearly attributable to the banking system, the credit system; and that the simple operation of collecting the dues to the Government in specie will have the magical effect to protect the country against over-trading, wild speculation, bankruptcies, fluctuations and suspensions. Why, sir, all history, all experience, all analogy, contradict such an idea. Two of the wildest speculations that ever entered the brain of man were devised, prosecuted, and exploded in hard money times; the one in a nation where there was no bank in existence, the other in a nation where a bank had been but recently instituted, with but limited capital, and only partially in operation; I need scarcely state that I allude to the South Sea scheme and the Mississippi scheme. The history of those times are full of individual failures and bankruptcies, in amount and extent unsurpassed at the present day; and as to the fluctuations in prices at various times in the history of the world, before a bank had been invented, before such an idea had penetrated the mind of man, they were far greater than any now known to commerce or trade in any part of the globe where bank currency is established. I will read a few examples upon this point from Jacobe's "Inquiry into the production and consumption of the precious metals." In England, in the twelfth century, five hundred years before a bank was established, the price of wheat varied from 2s. a quarter to 13s. 8d. In 1258, it rose to £2. In 1270, it rose to £4 16s. and sometimes was sold at £6 8s. In 1823, it was down to 1s. 6d.; and in 1829, 1s. 4d. to 1s. and to 8d. I could multiply examples of these enormous fluctuations almost without number, not confined to the single commodity of wheat, or the single power of England, but to be found in every hard money Government on the globe. Why, sir, prices of commodities are not alone regulated by the amount of money in circulation; a variety of circumstances operates in fixing the value of commodities. If it be a commodity of subsistence, famine, pestilence, war, failure of crops and excess of crops, and various other causes, as well as an excess or deficiency of money or circulation, will operate upon its fluctuations in price. If it be an article of raw material, as cotton or wool, an excessive over-production or under-production will operate; the principles of supply and demand bear powerfully in regulating prices. To suppose that even an exclusive use of gold and silver by the people of this country, as well as by the Government in its transactions, would be a protection against fluctuations in prices, wild speculations, individual bankruptcies, is a supposition that all history and all experience forbid. To propose to legislate as this bill does, even partially, upon such an absurd supposition, is nothing more nor less than for the most free, civilized, and enlightened nation on the face of the earth to tack suddenly round, and take a retrograde movement to the barbarous dark ages and hard money times, to the tilt and tournament days of Europe, with all the calamities and miseries of that gloomy period. If our Chief Magistrate sincerely desires to save his people from the catastrophe of wild speculation and bankruptcies, there is one way to do it, and only one way; let him blot out of existence our foreign and domestic commerce, sink in the wide and deep ocean all our fine packet ships, steam vessels, sloops; pass unqualified non-intercourse edicts and embargo laws; traverse our sea-coast, our lake coast, our mighty rivers and our small rivers, our canals, and sink every steamboat, canal-boat and trading vessel of every kind and dimensions; and prohibit the building of more; traverse over four thousand miles of railroad, (that seems to be an eye sore to him,) and tear up their iron from their fastnesses; interdict all trade between the States; and he will then have effected his object, without demolishing the "gigantic banking institutions" that he seems to think has produced all the overtrading and wild speculation, and ruinous fluctuations in prices, in values, in morals.

Now, sir, let us analyze this profound financial notion of the President a little further. The argument is, by the use of specie in the transactions of the Government, you prevent its exportation, and maintain a broader and safer basis for paper currency. Without any wanton disrespect or levity, I must say this is a bright financial idea. I had supposed, since the total failure of the experiment of the famous Specie Order, to prevent the exportation of the precious metals, that Executive as well as legislative interference had been abandoned. I tell the President, he might as well attempt to stop the current of the Potomac with his rattan—arrest the mighty rush of the Mississippi by a log dam—or cause the ocean's waves to be still by his majestic nod, as to check the exportation of the precious metals, whenever the foreign exchanges are against us by an unfavorable balance of trade—by the use or operation of this miserable machine of a Sub-Treasury, consisting of a few iron safes, bolts and bars, and such like paraphernalia as decorate any prison in the land. Specie, like water, will find its level—it has no fixed abiding place—it goes wherever the channels of trade carry it; you cannot confine it to any spot or any country. But, sir, the remaining financial idea in this paragraph of the message is more supremely ridiculous, if possible, than the one I have been commenting upon. It is the old theory of Dr. Sangrado revived again, and applied to finance—"bloodletting and warm water," the panacea of the doctor for all diseases. That the analogy may appear in all its just similitude, I will read a short extract from the biography of the doctor. "When Dr. Sangrado was called to the Licenciate Sidello, in his extremity he ordered his surgeon to take six porringers of blood, as the first effort to supply the want of perspiration. Then he said to the surgeon, return in three hours and take as much more, and repeat the same evacuation to-morrow. It is a gross error to think that blood is necessary to human life—a patient cannot be blooded too much." Who can doubt, after having read this short sentence, but what our worthy President is practising in finance upon this theory: depletion, depletion, he says, is the idea. Demand ten at first impulse, but upon a second "sober thought" five millions of silver in the transactions of Government dues; take that amount from the banks, and by this process of abstraction, or specie phlebotomy, you strengthen the banks—"maintain a broader and safer basis for the paper currency"—the banks would thus be rendered more sound and the community more safe, cannot admit of a doubt. O! delusion of man, if you really think so. O! gullible community, if you can be cheated out of your common sense by such financial jargon. The cardinal foundation of bank credit is the bullion they hold in possession—in accordance with the relation it bears to the amount of circulation, is that credit considered sound or doubtful; subtract from the banks, says the President, a given sum of bullion—(take from them the vital spark—the soul of their body—the ethereal fire,) "and you add to their strength," you "widen the basis of their circulation." The very opposite of what the President contends, will be, and has been the effect of the practical operation of this scheme. Here again we have the light of experience, before which theory vanishes—instead of strengthening the banks, one-half of them or more have fallen under the remedy, paralytic, if not actually dead. With all due deference to the President, I must be permitted to say, he takes a very narrow view of the subject when he supposes that an abstraction of four or five millions of specie will scarcely be felt by the banks and the community. As was ably remarked by a distinguished financier, in discussing a different subject, "by taking away the very basis upon which five-sixths of the currency rests, you produce effects that can never be arithmetically calculated, and of which no adequate conception can be formed. An exact ratio would contract the whole currency from which the specie is thus drawn in the proportion in which paper is based on specie. It is notorious, such a measure never operates in an exact ratio, but a loose ratio, arising from the alarm, panic, and dismay they create, and the commercial resources they cut off." Surely it cannot be necessary for me to argue so absurd, so ridiculous a proposition.

Let us, Mr. Chairman, for a few moments examine the effects of this measure upon the creditor and debtor classes of the country—these two divisions of society embrace the entire community. The relation of creditor and debtor is a sacred relation—a relation that cannot be touched by legislation, either adding to or diminishing the obligation of the contract, without violating the spirit and letter of the Constitution. Though many may be the cases where, according to the high principles of equity and eternal justice, the letter of the bond should not be paid, yet it is better to submit to individual injustice and ruin, than surrender a sound and safe general principle. I assume that the ultimate design, and, if not the design, the inevitable effect of this measure will be to destroy all bank currency, and leave nothing as circulating medium but gold and silver, and Government paper. This, I conceive, I have established beyond all cavil. It is in vain for the President to try to persuade even the most credulous man, after he has read his various messages, that his ultimate object is not "a demolition" of all existing banks. Mark the equivocal, non-committal paragraph on this point in his last message. He says, "in a country so commercial as ours, banks in some form will always exist," clearly indicating that in their present form perpetuity was not one of their attributes; if he does not mean this, why crowd every message with denunciation upon denunciation, charging them with perfidy, treachery, infidelity, resorting to all the low demagogue cant, such as "monopolies," "irresponsible corporations," "dangers of associated wealth," alleging it to be their tendency to encourage extravagance, luxury, demoralization. It is true, after exhausting the vocabulary of low slang, he and his followers never fail to wind up with the reservation, that in all this they mean no hostility to the banks. Oh! no, sir. The President in this reminds me of an assault and battery I witnessed when a boy. In passing the road one Christmas eve, I suddenly came upon two men in the middle of the highway—one was flat upon his back, the other setting astride of his breast, face to face, with his left hand gripped in the hair of his fellow-citizen, and a two pound rock in his hand, deliberately striking him in the forehead, the blood rolling down both sides of his head, unable to make any successful resistance, having tasted of John Barleycorn a little too freely the over-day. He yet had the use of his tongue—he petitioned his antagonist to desist in most zealous and piteous terms. The fellow astride, with the same cool, calm, sycophantical benevolence of our Chief Magistrate and his clique towards the banks, (one-half of which is now perfectly paralytic, and the other in a kind of torpid existence under his beneficent treatment,) exclaimed, "be still, be still, I don't mean to hurt you," (repeating it,) "I don't mean to hurt you." Now, sir, the reply of this unfeeling monster in human shape, was about as convincing to the judgment of that suffering man, as the logic of the President is to the stockholders in those banking institutions—yes, those institutions, that in 1834 it was offensive to the nostrils of the President and his Secretary, as State Rights men, to insinuate aught against, or even whisper suspicion of their utility—of their expediency—of their unquestioned solidity—their capability to discharge all the purposes of the Government, and all the business transactions of the community. In connection with this part of the subject, I cannot pass by the extraordinary change of opinion of the President and Secretary, in the space of a few years, upon the powers of this Government over the State banks, as likewise the expediency of exercising those powers. In the debate in the Senate of the United States, in the year 1827 upon the establishment of a uniform bankrupt law, Mr. Branch of North Carolina proposed an amendment extending the act to banking corporations. Let us see what our present Chief Magistrate then thought and said upon this subject, two years before he was indoctrinated by the Missouri Senator. Mr. Van Buren said, "it could not be denied that the clause interfered with the regulations of State Governments, which was an odious exercise of power not granted by the Constitution. By including this subject of incorporations, it will be taken entirely from the States, and subjected to the power of the bankrupt system. This was never done, and never attempted in any country on the face of the globe. When the Constitution was framed, such an attribute was never thought of by those who authorized the establishment of a bankrupt system." The present Secretary of the Treasury, in same debate, took the same view, only using stronger language if possible. I read a short extract from his speech: "he was opposed to this feature (including banking corporations) because to pass it would be to bring subjects and citizens within the scope of the General Government, never contemplated by our fathers; would be sweeping all classes into this Norwegian whirlpool, this vortex of disaster and difficulty to State Rights and State independence." Here then is the doctrine distinctly avowed in 1827 by the President and Secretary, that to pass a bankrupt law embracing corporations, was not only a palpable violation of the Constitution, but a wanton outrage upon the severeignty and dignity of the States. Sir, contrast these extracts with the passages already presented to the attention of the committee, from the Messages of 1837 and 1839, and the reports of the Secretary, and what distrust of sincerity must attach to any political opinion expressed by those distinguished personages: what confidence can be reposed in any statement they make upon the most grave and vital political questions? How inconsistent is the present opinion and policy of the President and his Secretary on this topic, with the boasted feature of this bill. No reasoning, no argument, is required to prove that the passage of a bankrupt law as recommended by the President and Secretary in these words—"the Treasury Department has suggested the propriety of a uniform law of bankruptcies of corporations. Through the instrumentality of such a law, a salutary check may doubtless be imposed on the issues of paper money, fully authorized by the Constitution"—would create a more dangerous connection of Government and banks—a more odious union of the political power with the money power, than has ever existed in this country. I will not stop to argue this question in detail, the mere statement of the proposition must strike every unbiassed mind with irresistible conviction that the inevitable result would be total bank "demolition," or total bank subserviency. Leaving this digression, I return to the point I was discussing. It is in vain for the Senator from Missouri to disclaim any idea, through this measure, to destroy all bank paper currency, notwithstanding his express disavowal that such will not be its effect, after the volley of billingsgate stuff I have nauseated the stomachs, I fear, of every member of this committee, by reading. It is in vain for the Senator from Pennsylvania to attempt to gull the hardworking yeomanry of the Keystone State by his clap-trap resolution, proposing an amendment to the United States Constitution, to give Congress power over the State banks, and his accompanying statement that he was no enemy of the banks—'regulate, not destroy," was his motto—when he embodies in his remarks upon this very bill, this sweeping denunciation: "our system of banking is the very worst, and the most irresponsible that has ever existed on the face of the earth." With these evidences, I feel warranted in the conclusion I have adduced. However ignorant the small fry in either branch of Congress supporting this measure may be, and however ignorant many of the honest yeomen, who see only the surface of things—secrets of state are reserved for the master spirits of the party; and I now make the declaration, after close examination, after mature deliberation and reflection upon public affairs in this country for the last ten years, if you can find precisely the views and designs of the Senator from Missouri, you will know where the party in power will ultimately land; no matter what may be their apparent position upon the surface of things, sooner or later he brings them to the adoption of his measures. For example, trace the party upon the currency question, at first sustaining a recharter of the United States Bank against him; suddenly yielding; trace them upon the removal of the deposites; trace their conduct in relation to the State banks; upon the specie circular; trace the party upon the disposition of the public lands. He has dictated and controlled the entire policy; trace them upon the expunging resolution: "solitary and alone he put the ball in motion," and ultimately carried it by a triumphant majority. He now boasts and proves, that this great scheme, so universally denounced by the party in 1834, now so idolized, is his invention—and no candid man who understands the political history of this nation for the last ten years will doubt it. He will still continue to rule de facto, if this dynasty continues in power, I care not who fills the chair of state, and ultimately he will consummate his scheme of a great Executive machinery, a mammoth Treasury bank, upon the total subversion, (in his own language,) the "demolition," of all banking institutions. The process will be a violent one. Sir, under the operation of the banking system and on the faith of its continuance, in some form, all our business has been undertaken, all contracts entered into. Abrogate the entire system, and you have a debt to the banks alone of five hundred millions, besides the countless millions of existing debt between individual and individual, (to say nothing of the foreign debt of two hundred millions,) with one hundred millions of bank paper and eighty millions of specie to discharge this sum; leaving a debt unpaid, after exhausting every dollar of money in the country, both paper and specie, of five hundred and twenty millions. It is only necessary to state the fact, unvarnished and unexaggerated, to strike the dullest mind with the irretrievable ruin that must ensue. And what adds grievously to the inevitable catastrophe is the reflection that the heaviest burden falls upon the poor and needy, and those in humble circumstances. The rich dread no change, while the rights of property are held sacred; they are the creditor class; in passing from a redundant or only a limited currency to a contracted currency, the creditor grows rich, by the appreciation in the value of money, without any corresponding consideration, whilst the amount of debt remains undiminished. The debtor's means are lessened in the ratio of contraction. No, sir, not in the exact ratio, but a compound, an unnatural ratio. A debt contracted in '36, when our paper circulation was two hundred millions, is already doubled, independent of interest; as the contraction of circulation progresses, the oppression and unequal injustice increases in an unnatural ratio. The price of labor and property is already reduced one half—annihilate the one hundred millions of paper, and you still leave a debt of six hundred millions to be discharged with eighty millions of specie. Who can, by any rule of arithmetic, undertake to calculate the depreciation of property, and the appreciation of capital; the suffering and ruin, the wo and misery such a process must bring upon the debtor portion of the community, and the poor of society. Who can estimate the princely fortunes such an operation must give to the capitalists, the wealthy classes of society. Sir, I venture the assertion with confidence, that under such a state of things, John Jacob Astor could, in a twelve month, walk up one side and down the other of the great Erie Canal, from New York to Buffalo, and from Buffalo back again to New York, on his own soil. And inferior capitalists could boast of their thousands and tens of thousands of acres of the choicest land and houses; their tens and hundreds of tenants, every one of whom perhaps possessing more mind and morals than his landlord. What a most enviable state of society this would be under a hard money Government. What a happy land. But, sir, what cares the Missouri Senator and his surgeon Martin Van Buren for all these consequences to others: it neither moves their sensibilities, nor shakes their nerves. Their own selfish ends are the ends they aim at, not their country's. Sir, here again I discover a striking resemblance in the notions of Dr. Sangrado and the author of this financial "expedient." The Doctor, when appealed to by a surgeon, who protested to the Doctor, after following his remedy of "blood letting and warm water" to the letter, every one of his patients left him in the lurch, to surrender his theory, and make an experiment of chemical preparations. "I would willingly make that experiment, (he replied,) provided it could have no bad consequences; but I have published a book, in which I have extolled the frequent use of bleeding and aqueous draughts, and wouldst thou have me decry my own work?" 'Oh you are certainly in the right," said the surgeon, "you must not give your enemies such a triumph over you; they would say you are at last disabused, and ruin your reputation; perish rather the nobility, clergy, and people, and let us continue in our own path." Sentiments very like have been written and spoken by the party in power, such as "he deserves to break who trades on borrowed capital;" the more than barbarian exclamations, "perish credit," perish commerce;" who so dull as not make the application. Now, with all the ruin, wo, and, misery with which the land is afflicted, proceeding from the practical operation of this financial scheme, our Chief Magistrate softly lolls upon his Parisian sofa, unhurt, unscathed, exclaiming, "my own views of the subject are unchanged." Is this the result of stern Executive duty, emanating from a deep conviction of patriotism? If so, let all praise and all honor be given for the motive.

But are there no circumstances calculated to throw a shade of suspicion on his purity of conduct? Is there no portion of the mass of sixteen millions of people who feel no embarrassments, no distress, in this general wreck? Is there no green spot, on which the eye can rest, and say to the besom of destruction, this is your landmark, thus far canst thou go, and no farther? Is there any portion of this sixteen millions of people, that are benefited, that are profiting, that are growing rich off the misfortunes and sufferings of the balance of the community? "True, O King" there is. Who are they? And where is the favored spot? Foremost in the list are the office holders, with fixed, permanent salaries. And the chief of that class, the President of the United States, with an annual salary of $25,000, to be paid in gold and silver, by the provisions of this bill. Next in the list is your public printer, the official organ, receiving his $2 50 00, with a clear profit of 33½ per cent. upon that sum, besides liberal wages for all labor, as has been proved by sworn witness in the printing investigation this session; brokers, shavers, hard money Shylocks, and usurers; these individuals constitute the favored few that this measure will profit. These are the persons, and the only persons, out of this immense mass of sixteen millions of population, who are not now groaning under the ruinous practical effects of the financial policy of the party in power. And yet this pampered vehicle of slander and filth, published "by authority"—fed by the patronage of the party and the Executive, the bosom friends and backstain associates of the President, insults a suffering community, with the scornful rebuke, "there is no pressure an honest man should regret." "Thou ghost of Famine," and †"Thou galvanized corpse"—bloated and surfeited with the illgotten wealth of a plundered Treasury, fattening upon the spoils, wrung in hard money from the people, how dare you thus insult suffering millions, that are now writhing in want and despondency? How dare you thus insult the people, and still wave the banner of Democracy; a banner once sacred, now all tattered, torn, and polluted? Methinks, when I look upon your like and your worthy patron‡ bleating Democracy, that I can see, distinct in my mind's eye, the martyred Madame Rowland, the victim of the French Revolution, for opinion's sake, on her way to the guillotine, riding on the vehicle of the bloody executioner, raising her eyes suddenly upon the statue of Liberty, she exclaimed: "Oh, Liberty! Liberty! what deeds have not been done in thy holy name?" And well may the patriot of this day and country, exclaim, "Oh, Democracy! Democracy! what deeds have not been done in thy sacred name!" Pass this bill, Mr. Chairman, and continue the present rulers in power, and you sweep over the country a desolation more blighting than the sirocco; more destructive than the tornado; more uprooting than the earthquake; more withering than the breath of the great Bohon Upas. Sir, I object to this measure, because it is anti-union in its tendency. What were the great objects, Mr. Chairman, intended to be obtained by the adoption of the Federal Constitution? If there be any one prominent above all others, it was the securement of a sound and uniform currency. The action of this Government in the discharge of the other leading powers of the Constitution, the common defence and commerce powers has been, and ever will be unequal, partial; it is inevitable. The burdens and benefits of this Government, never can, in the nature of things, be exactly uniform. The geography of this country, defines this as unavoidable; the disbursements necessarily must be made mainly upon the exterior. The revenues in the meantime are raised, in every part of this extensive country, uniformly. This necessarily draws the circulating medium from the interior, and accumulates it upon the border; and upon Kentucky, this operation is double; besides paying her equal share of taxes through the customs, no State in the Union, in proportion to her population, contributes more to the National Treasury, through the land offices. Here are two outpourings of her currency, with no returning stream, by way of Government expenditure or disbursement. All must perceive this process, unexaggerated by any depreciation of currency, or oppression of heavy exchanges, makes her contributions oppressive and impoverishing. But, of all this, Kentucky has not and does not complain; her representation have always acted upon the principle of the greater good; that to legislate for such a country as ours, requires expanded views and liberal self devotion; that in a country embracing every variety of climate, soil, and productions, diversified in its interests that legislation, which is necessary for the common defence and common prosperity of the nation may conflict with the interests of particular sections: this of stern necessity must be; it is part of the price of our greatness of our freedom, of our constitutional liberty. No State of this Confederacy, has exhibited herself a more willing sacrifice, to this inevitable destiny. Although precisely the same language is employed in the Constitution to define foreign and domestic commerce, yet, in the space of fifty years, legislation, including appropriations, of almost countless millions, to the protection and advancement of commerce, not a line of your statute book is marked with an expenditure within her borders. It is true, Congress, at various times, passed bills for her benefit, but they uniformly met with Executive vengeance—they fell victims to the deposite blow of the veto power; while precisely similar appropriations, in other sections, received the Executive sanction. And yet the devotion of Kentucky to this Union, in despite of neglect, of Executive outrage, has not been surpassed by the most favored State. In peace she has, for a half century, paid her share of the public revenues, by direct and indirect taxation, without murmur or complaint—no resistance of revenue laws, no nullification. In war she has glutted your armies with as good soldiers and as true as ever spilt their blood in Liberty's cause. Where, then, Mr. Chairman, I ask, is Kentucky to look for a pittance of remuneration for her contributions and her sacrifices, ceaseless as they have been, and I fear are destined to be, whilst this Union is preserved? (and may it be perpetual.) What link is there to fasten her to the car of State? What tie is to awaken her affection and fix her allegiance to this Federal Government, under all these forbidding circumstances? There is one remaining power given in the Constitution, the common charter of our liberties, and that power is over the currency. Annihilate this power, or refuse its exercise—omit to call it into active, living use, as this measure contemplates, and as its authors avow—and you sever the strong cord of interest that fastens the interior States to the Union. Whatever of affection, whatever of devotion, their people may cherish towards the General Government, will have to emanate from a pride of national honor, national grandeur, national glory. Sir, I speak not for the entire interior, I speak only for myself and my constituents. I assert the power of this Government over the currency. I go further: I say that this Government is not wisely, is not faithfully administered, without a just exercise of this power. I charge this to be a duty, an enjoined duty, an imperative duty, a duty from which this Government cannot escape without an abandonment of the leading motive of its creation. Having stripped the States of this power, it is the bounden duty of this Government to use it. I repudiate with scorn the doctrine contained in the President's message, and repeated in this debate, of a separate interest between this Government and the people; that the paramount duty of this Government "is to take care of itself, and let the people take care of themselves."§ I hurl with indignant contempt upon its authors the sentiment that this Government, at the immense cost of twenty millions annually, was intended to secure to the people the privilege, the glorious privilege, of taking care of themselves. I demand, in the name of my constituents, (many of whom now, after a life of toil, industry, and frugality, are forced to surrender their firesides, their homes, by the ruthless policy of the past and present Administrations,) an exercise of the plain and beneficent powers of the Constitution, a fulfilment of its high and imperative duties; and in their name, I hold none more sacred, none more obligatory, than that of furnishing to this entire nation a sound and uniform currency, suited to its genius, its habits, its pursuits, its trade, its diversified interests. Can it be that Washington and all the sages of the Revolution wholly misunderstood the powers and duties of this Government?—men who lived before the Constitution, and lived under it—men who were eye-witnesses of the necessities that caused its adoption—men whose only aim "was their country's, God's, and truth's." Can it be that a convention of sages, solemnly called together, and after elaborate and trying investigation, consultation, and deliberation, framed a charter of powers, a Constitution, and yet were incapable of understanding or correctly construing the work of their own hands?—that Providence, in his inscrutable ways, has reserved to our Chief Magistrate the enviable privilege of revealing the only true construction of this most mysterious instrument? And that revelation, when reduced to plain English, is this, that this is a Government omnipotent for evil, but impotent for good—a Government of individual absolutism, "of one man power"—a Government that can do nothing, without corruption, but impose penalties and restraints; the same act that confers discretion and defines duties, creates a prison and defines the term of penitentiary service. What a commentary upon the construction of our rulers! what a disgraceful reflection upon this scheme, in the eyes of any candid, sober-minded man. In the eloquent language of an enlightened statesman, "that whatever is positively beneficent, whatever is actively good, whatever spreads abroad blessings and benefits which all can see and all can feel, must all this be reprobated as dangerous and obnoxious policy, hurrying us to the double ruin of a Government turned into despotism by the mere increase of acts of beneficence, and a people corrupted beyond all hope of rescue by the improvement of their condition."

Sir, gentlemen call upon us, an impotent minority, powerless in the Executive, powerless in the other branch, powerless in this House, except in temporary resistance—merely sufficient strength to stay for a limited time the hand of the executioner—to give a remedy. They tauntingly demand of us our plan, after having rejected, by a negative vote in both branches of Congress, with the repeated declaration of the President, in his State papers, that he would veto the only measure we consider competent to relieve the country. Gentlemen still persist in demanding our scheme of redress for grievances, our measure of relief. Sir, I have no concealment of my opinions upon this momentous question; I have already, I trust, made myself perfectly intelligible upon this point. My constituents want no more financial "experiments," no more "untried expedients;" they ask you to restore them where you found them ten years ago, when you commenced your financial quackery and "tinkering" with the currency; "they ask for patriotism to restore what party, for miserable selfish purposes, has snatched from them." In the language of the Roman Emperor, whose general had suffered himself to be surprised by the crafty Arminius, and his choice cohorts cut to pieces: Augustus, almost driven to madness by so serious a loss, in deep sorrow and dejection would exclaim, "Oh Varus, Varus, restore me my legions!" In the name of my suffering and indignant constituents, I demand of the Chief Magistrate and his party to give them back the sound currency you have "demolished," the universal prosperity your experiments have destroyed, the individual confidence you have cut asunder, the State credit you have wantonly assailed and depressed, the public credit you have impaired; give back the incalculable good you have desolated, or be hurled from the powers you have wickedly abused, to bring these evils upon them.

Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen sincerely desire to know by what means the public finances can be restored, a bankrupt Treasury replenished, public and private credit invigorated, prosperity, public and private, placed upon a permanent foundation, I will tell them. I propose to lead them in no untried paths; I point to an old beaten track, a road travelled successfully for forty years, a highway that history, experience, analogy, that all resemblance between our present and our past condition suggests; a road marked out first by Washington in 1791, a road remarked by Madison in 1816, after double refined experience, after every experiment, every contrivance, every financial device, had been resorted to and failed. Sir, I now warn the Executive and the country, that, after they have gone through the entire round of financial shifts, experiments, and expedients, they will all terminate as they always have terminated, in utter discomfiture, and destruction of public and private credit and prosperity, and at last with an impoverished Treasury, a heavy national debt, created in a time of profound peace, without calamity from Heaven, with a people embarrassed in every pursuit of life, (office holders and brokers excepted.) Before the finances are restored, the business of the country placed in its wonted channels, the car of State will have again to be put on the "old beaten track."

I cannot conclude, Mr. Chairman, without noticing briefly some of the examples of foreign Governments, offered as models of imitation to the people of this country. After authorities, this world is mostly governed by examples, by precedents; falsely and deceptively used, they are the second most potent weapon of error. Our Chief Magistrate, being aware of this, has neglected no pains to obtain garbled and imperfect information from other countries to deceive and mislead. The President in his last annual message represents that, in a pamphlet of correspondence to which he refers, it will be ascertained that, out of twenty-seven foreign Governments, twenty-six forbid the use of public money by the agents of Government, and that twenty one have adopted the Sub-Treasury as their financial plan; a circumstance of high commendation in the estimation of the President in favor of this scheme. It is a little remarkable it did not strike his mind that there was another feature in all these Governments in which there was perfect uniformity—that out of the entire twenty-seven, there was no republic, no democracy, no free government; that the "one man power" that seems to haunt his brain to madness, pervaded every Government of the twenty-seven examples referred to; that if partial unanimity upon one point of administration was a ground of imitation, undivided unanimity upon another was surely a stronger argument in favor of its adoption. Why not, if we embark in aping after monarchs, go the whole at once? Why not, if it is intended under the delusive guise of democracy to clothe the President with all the powers of a despot, call him by his proper name? Sir, I now propose to look into a few of these examples, so boastingly paraded by the President and his hard money orators in this and the other branch of Congress; and the first in the list of foreign nations is the Government of France. France, it is said, is a hard money Government, and practises the Sub-Treasury in the management of her finances. Now, sir, it is not true that the revenues or commerce of France are conducted exclusively in hard money. Sir, for the information of the committee, and for the better information of the country upon this point, I ask the attention of the House while I read a single paragraph from a very able pamphlet, written by the Vice Governor of the Bank of France,* upon currency and finance. Speaking of the Sub-Treasury, in its practical operation, as connected with the banking system of that country, this distinguished writer uses this language: "The branches of the Bank of France are supplied with specie by the surplus of the receivers general, and by private deposites of individuals, to be reimbursed at sight at Paris; and when these resources fail, by remittances of coin from the mother bank at Paris. The receivers general, who are near the branches, (mark this,) find it a convenience and a safety to place their specie due the Treasury with them, the amount being paid the Treasury at Paris by the Bank. The banks thus lessen the expenses of general business, and the amount of those transportations of specie, which, crossing each other in every direction, and often meeting each other on the way, occasion to trade, to the collection of the public revenue, and to the country itself, very considerable cost of carriage and interest; transportations which excite astonishment in men of business from countries where a more advanced credit system provides more economical methods of circulation." What a commentary upon the principles of this measure; what an explosion of the declaration that France used nothing but specie in the transactions of her finances, and that her depositaries were iron vaults and safes; what a biting criticism upon the ridiculous folly of the practical operation of this scheme.

This same distinguished financier, speaking of the trade and currency of France, uses this language—"Paris has become the central point of general circulation; the chief instrument of circulation is necessarily paper on Paris, which assumes every possible shape, bills of exchange, and all sorts of bills. The effluence of such paper, which may be called the general currency, contributes in a very large measure to nourish that large discount business, which is done in Paris by the private bankers, the capitalists, and ultimately by the Bank of France. It would be impossible to ascertain, even by approximation, the sum in circulation and paid annually; but an idea of its magnitude may be formed from one fact, that the Bank received in 1836 to the amount of fifteen hundred millions of francs, and in 1838 more than seventeen hundred millions." And yet Congress and the country are gravely referred, by the President and the advocates of this bill, to France as a hard money Government, practising the Sub-Treasury system. I would recommend our Chief Magistrate, before he communicates to Congress another message, that he should consult higher authorities than are to be found in his pamphlet of foreign correspondence. If he can spare the time from his indispensable Executive duties, such as reviewing the standing army, promenading the saloons and splendid walks at the White Sulphur and Saratoga, and addressing the exclusive democracy at Castle Garden, upon the comforts and glories of hard money, iron safes and vaults; to read carefully this pamphlet, and other able publications of like character, upon these most abstruse of all questions, currency and finance, the President would find much useful information in some essays written, in this new country of ours, upon these topics. I know, sir, he has not been altogether remiss in this duty; any man who will critically examine his various State papers will readily perceive this. He has studied most profoundly an American work on banking and currency; a rich fountain for the Chief Magistrate of sixteen millions of enlightened freemen to draw lessons from upon currency and finance. If I did not fear I might be deemed presumptuous, I would advise the President to lay Gouge's book aside, and take up Gallatin's essay on currency, and works of similar ability; works worthy the study of the wisest and ablest of statesmen; works from which he may draw deep and rich draughts of financial learning; works worthy the study of the chief ruler of a great and enlightened people. I would particularly call his attention to this paragraph in Mr. Gallatin's pamphlet, 1830, touching the measure under discussion: "It must at the same time be acknowledged that, inasmuch as the revenue may be collected, and the public moneys may be kept in chests, and transferred to distant places without banks, it cannot be asserted that those institutions are absolutely necessary for those purposes. All this may be done, though with a greater risk, and in a more inconvenient and expensive manner. Public chests might be established, and public receivers or subtreasurers might be appointed, at the places where there are now offices of the Bank of the United States, and specie might be transferred from place to place as the public service required. (I would especially call his attention to this sentence,) with the exception of the power of receiving private deposites, the object of which provision is not perceived. This is precisely the species of National Bank which has been suggested in the President's last message "‡ This essay is pregnant with information well worthy of a chief magistrate's calm and deliberate study. But to return for a moment to the correspondence with foreign nations.§ Had the President been a candid, impartial and patriotic inquirer after truth, he would have found much useful knowledge in that pamphlet, besides the information communicated in his annual message; he would have discovered information touching the interest and honor of this nation, of this kind—"Another check, however, to the embezzlement of the public moneys by the receivers consists in the difficulty and danger of leaving the country clandestinely. Besides, if he even succeeded in escaping, the continental powers never refuse to surrender offenders of this class." Sir, had our vigilant President availed himself of this knowledge, and employed himself in the detection of the grand plunderers of the Treasury, who have been for years travelling and living in princely style in the most magnificent cities of Europe—Swartwout with his million and a quarter, and Price with his thousands—instead of burning the midnight lamp, manufacturing a labored defence and recommendation of a thrice condemned financial scheme, and a cruel and wanton attack upon State institutions, his conduct would have challenged and received the gratitude, praise, and honor of a free people. But no, sir; no demand is made for their surrender, no effort is made for their detection, no discharge of a high and imperative Executive duty; what a vigilant public servant; what a watchful guardian of the people's money; what an example of official rectitude. And yet, sir, in the face of this flagrant dereliction of public duty on the part of the President, he has the consummate impudence to insult the people and the States by telling them they have become too prodigal in contracting debts, too luxurious in their living, and too lax in their morals; but that he and his household, let others do as they may, intend to live to the Lord, that they must, at all hazards, "hold erect the standard of, morality and law." What solemn mockery of virtue! There is one other principle developed in that correspondence that our Chief Magistrate has overlooked, or wilfully neglected to profit by the suggestion; the principle is this "the best security against the misuse of the public money, is the good character of the functionary," a doctrine abounding with wisdom. It is passing strange go sage a sentiment should have escaped the attention of an anxious inquirer after sound political truths.

Sir, I would, had I time, like to review more minutely this pamphlet of foreign correspondence, but justice to other topics will not allow. I will now proceed to notice two or three other examples of hard money Governments, that have been arrayed in debate upon this bill as worthy the imitation of this country. Before I proceed, however, I wish to say a few words upon the relative condition of England, France, and America. It has been contended in debate, in view of showing the superior excellency of a hard money currency, over a mixed currency, that England, though a splendid and magnificent country, was the poor man's prison, the hot bed of misery and starvation to the working classes; and this all attributable to the pernicious influence of paper money. That France, though a less splendid, less magnificent country, was the "happy land" of the middle and laboring classes. I have a few facts to to offer the committee to explode all this poetry, which I will present without comment. These are the facts and statistics upon this much debated topic. The kingdom of Great Britain has an area of 120,000 square miles; France, an area of 200,000 square miles; Great Britain, a population of 24 millions; France, a population of 32 millions. First. Agricultural productions. I select the single article of grain, as this is the staff of life, for rich and poor. Grain. Bushels per given average Great Britain, 414 millions, round numbers. France, 369 millions. Manufactures. Annual product of Great Britain. 2,365 millions of dollars; France, 360 millions of dollars. (Mark this.)

The comparative commercial and manufacturing power of Great Britain and France.

		FRANCE. Men power.	GREAT BRITAIN. Men power.
Animate power		6,303,019	7,275,497
Inanimate power.	Mills and hydraulic eng.	150,000,000	1,200,000
	Windmills	253,333	240 000
	Wind and navigation	3,000,000	12,000,000
	Steam engines	480,000	6,400,000
Totals,		11,536 352	27,115,497

Thus the total inanimate power applied to the arts in France scarcely exceeds the fourth of that applied in the United Kingdom of Great Britain, and the whole animate and inanimate power of the latter applied to manufactures and commerce is nearly treble the amount of that of the former. This is not all; see the comparative consumption in the two countries of two of the most pleasant and essential articles of human subsistence. Total consumption of sugar in all Europe per year, average calculation, 500,000 tons, of which 180 tons are consumed in Great Britain, and 90 tons in France. Annual consumption of coffee. The total consumption of Europe and the United States 138,500 tons, nearly one fourth of the whole consumed in the United States and Great Britain. In the latter, the consumption is about one pound per head; in the former, it is upwards of three pounds. Two countries impoverished and ruined by the use of paper money, according to the theory of our enlightened President and his clique of politicians. A glorious impoverishment! A most happy ruin! such as any hard working poor man ought to covet, and would, if he was not wheedled out of his senses by the vile falsehood and hypocrisy of hollow hearted and pretended friends. Once more on this topic—comparative consumption of cotton—Great Britain 228,000,000 lbs. annually, France 77,000,000. Now for the prices of labor in Great Britain, contrasted with labor in France and other hard money Governments. I read from the statistics of an able writer.*

"France	5s 8d	per week of	72	hours.
Switzerland	4 5	do.	82	do.
Austria	4 0	do.	76	do.
Saxony	2 6	do.	72	do.

Being an average of 3s 11¾ per week of 79 hours. The same Mr. Gregg states the existing wages of Englishmen to range from 15s to 30s a week."

I ask the attention of the poor man and the working classes, to these plain facts and statistics, and compare them with the poetry of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Williams, and then make up their judgment upon the relative comfort and happiness of the people, the great mass of the people, (not the aristocracy) of the two countries. But, sir, the state of pauperism in Great Britain has been arrayed and called up in this debate, by the same gentleman, in most piteous lamentation, as another evidence of the impolicy and ruin of paper money. Now, sir, I offer a short table, to show the pauperism of Paris, the richest capital of any hard money Government on earth, and it transcends, in misery, any thing to be found in Great Britain.

"According to a recent return, the following are the number of paupers in the different arrondissements of Paris: 1st, 3,599; 2d, 2,646; 3d, 2,406; 4th, 3,129; 5th, 4,699; 6th, 6,936; 7th, 2,939; 8th, 9,938; 9th, 6,332; 10th, 5,678; 11th, 3,896; 12th, 11,857. The total is 63,947, without including the pauvres honteux† inscribed at the Bureaux de Bienfaisance." The same honorable gentleman has exhibited tables of bankruptcies in England, to show the fluctuations in trade, and the mad speculations engendered by a paper money system. Let us see how this matter stands upon fair and just comparison. I read from a learned discourse delivered by a distinguished Frenchman,† in December, 1839, consisting chiefly of statistical memoranda. He states the registered cases of bankruptcy for that year at 929; the whole number declared to the Tribunal of Commerce, from the first of January, 1839, to the first of January, 1840, 1,013, and the aggregate sums upwards of sixty millions of francs. These are the failures, formally recorded and complete; but it is authenically added, that nearly as many cases of private arrangements, compositions, with creditors took place, swelling the preceding amounts of insolvency to more than one hundred millions. According to the statistics of the same writer, the number and amount of bankruptcies, since the year 1835, many of them total failures, others partial, exceeds that of all the banks that have ever suspended or broken in the United States. So much for the comparative fluctuations and bankruptcies of hard money Governments and paper money Governments. But there are two other examples of foreign Governments, relied upon and recommended by the hard money orators of this and the other branch of Congress, in support of this bill. I read an extract or two from the speech of the Missouri Senator, delivered on this bill in the Senate, in these words: "France and Holland present the two highest models for the study of currency, which the history of the world affords. Holland is a subject for the study of the Ameriaan statesman." Holland! Little Holland, with a territory of eleven thousand square miles!—a single State of this Union containing 70,000—the territory of the United States 22,000,000 square miles! The inequality of territory itself, writes upon the assertion stupidity, or a wanton, wilful effort at gullibility—humbugery. I now give, sir, a specimen of the veracity of this distinguished Senator, that his abused followers may see and know what character of idol they worship. I read from the same speech: "This is Holland, a country which has no paper money banks."

I now read from an authority,† upon this point, high in credit in all civilized countries, as a work on commerce and finance. "The Bank of Amsterdam was founded in 1609—(Amsterdam, the capital of Holland.) This establishment continued to flourish till the invasion of the French, 1795. Between the years 1651 and 1672, the commerce of Holland appears to have reached its greatest height. In 1690, the entire shipping of Europe amounted to two millions tons, Holland being the owner of more than half;† according to the estimate of a distinguished writer. Holland all this time transacting her domestic and foreign trade, principally in paper money, certificates of deposite, in the language of Mr. Gallatin, "as much bank bills as notes issued by our banks of discount in this country." It was left to the sagacity of the "Great Humbugger," to discover that "hard money" had any agency in giving wealth, and power, and national glory to Holland. After the restoration of peace throughout Europe by the treaty of Aix la Chapelle, the trade of Holland rapidly declined. William the Fourth, Stadtholland, appointed a commission of the ablest financiers of the country to investigate the causes of the "lustre, repute, and dignity" of the former commerce of Holland, and the causes of their decline. That committee made a most able and elaborate report. I will not trouble the House by reading it, it can be found at large in the work I hold in my hand—I will only say, that it never entered the brain of one of these able financiers that hard money had any agency, either in building up or pulling down this immense commerce, and wealth, and renown of Holland. I will now read a brief paragraph from a distinguished author, upon the internal condition of Holland, this model for this country to copy lessons of Government from; this bright example for the American statesman. Sir William Temple, "mentions that in his time taxes were greatly increased, afterwards the necessities of the State lead to the imposition of taxes on corn, on flour when it was ground at the mill, and on bread when it came from the oven; on butter, and fish, and fruit; on income, and legacies, the sale or houses; in short, almost every article either of necessity or convenience." Amongst other evidences of the happy condition of the poor, he gives this statement, "one fish sauce, was in common use, which directly paid no fewer than thirty different duties of excise." This is a glorious Holland—"a model, a subject of study," for an American statesman, worthy the imitation and adoption of a free and enlightened people.

But this distinguished Senator, the great Mogul of the Democracy of this country, says in the same speech, "Holland is the country for our statesmen to study; but if she is too distant, let them cross over to the island of Cuba." Cuba! Cuba! a fit model for America—a little speck of land in the Gulf of Mexico, scarcely discernible to the naked eye, on the vast map of the world, with no Government of her own—the wretched, depraved, and degenerate colony, of the most degraded and rotten despotism of all Europe. A model for republican freemen; an island, without an institution of learning, a house of Divine worship, an institution of charity or humanity; without a public building, save it be a prison, to hold her unnumbered convicts; without a road or a highway a mile from her coast. A country that cannot, in the tide of time, boast of a statesman, a general, a philosopher, or a man of science of any kind; without manufactures, without arts; the home of pirates; the asylum of African kidnappers, the nursery of the slave trade. This spot of hell upon earth, is boastingly held up, in the Senate of the United States, as a choice model for the American statesman. This Administration, not content with the national disgrace incurred by importing bloodhounds from this island, to mangle and torture a handful of Indians, because they are unwilling to leave their homes, their firesides, their lands, and the graves of their fathers, in discharge of a treaty conceived in fraud and treachery, and insummated by force, they now propose to add another blot of dishonor to the national character, by importing a system of finance. Days of Danton and Robespierre, days of humanity and Christianity, when compared with this day of boasted civilization in this land of liberty. Gracious God, how long will the people slumber? When, O when will they awake from their deep sleep? "Must the very earth quake before they will arouse?" Can they be so blind as not to see that chains are making to rivet despotism upon them? Is it possible that in the first half century of American Independence, the people have become so depraved, that, like sheep, they are ready for the shambles? Forbid it, genius of freedom! Arouse from your slumbers and hurl the tyrants from their high places. Pass this bill, and let the people acquiesce in it, and have we not tied the purse to the swordhilt of the President? Will we not convert a pillar of freedom into an engine of despotism? My soul sickens within me when I contemplate this triumph of Executive will over popular opinion, by the appliances of Executive patronage.

Have we not a monarchy, practically a monarchy? are we not governed by one man? The title by which a ruler of a nation is called is immaterial; give him the power of a despot and he is a despot, though we may call him, and he may call himself, our servant.

In the conclusion Mr Chairman, if I thought a voice would be heard from one so humble as myself, I would invoke him who alone, in this crisis of universal distress, holds the power as an earthly, benefactor, to administer relief. I would appeal to him to give up the mad promise, made in his unaugural address, to follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor; to summon up moral firmness, the most difficult as well as the most praiseworthy of all courage, to acknowledge his errors, retrace his course, fall back upon the footsteps of Washington and Madison, characters worthy of all imitation, from the highest and proudest of mortals. I would say to him, sir, quit, oh quit you ruinous projects, stop on your downward road to destruction—destruction to the people's prosperity, destruction to civil liberty, destruction to your own present and future reputation. I would say to him, go and consult the light of experience, an experience that has been tried and proven successful upon more than one occasion of similar difficulty. I would go one step further. I would beseech him to cast from atound him his secret cabinet, his evil advisers, evil to himself, and evil to his country. I would say to him, in the language of the faithful guardian of the Roman treasure, "Strike, but hear me." Press not "experiment" upon "experiment," and "untried expedient" upon "untried expedient," until the long forbearance of this people shall become exhausted; until this nation, now the only abiding place of freedom, shall be hurried, by the madness of wicked rulers, into the rage of civil discord, or sink into that more horrible condition, the arms of sleepy despotism.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have no hope that any appeal of mine would move the heart of the high civil ruler of this nation; the edict has gone forth from the Hermitage, his bond is given for its execution; lest reason, judgment and experience might convince him of his error, and drive him from his purpose, he has closed every door behind him through which he might retreat; he has cut down every bridge of deliverance; and now, standing upon an awful precipice, with a suffering, bleeding country at his heels, with the broad gulf of inevitable ruin to himself and country before him, he, maniac-like, resolves—"sink or swim, live or die," my course is onward, sooner than surrender a miserable "expedient." In the language of Divine inspiration, I say—"let him alone; like Ephriam of old, he is wedded to his idol." And like all idolators, he deserves to perish; his doom is already written on the wall; the blazing capitals glare in his eyes by day, and haunt his distempered vision by night. It is as it should be, as it always has been; retributive justice is at hand; the God of mercy has said, He is also a God of vengeance. From the civil ruler of this nation, I appeal to the Ruler of the Universe; I pray his interposition; I entreat him to extend an arm of deliverance and rescue a sinking nation.

SPEECH OF MR. SERGEANT,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

In the House of Representatives, June 24, 1840—On the Sub-Treasury Bill.

My intention, Mr. Chairman, in what I have to say, is to address myself to the committee. There is no reason for speaking upon this subject to my constituents. They understand it quite as well as I do, many of them much better, having long had it under consideration, and viewed it in the light which their daily practical operations afford—the only true light in which questions touching the currency and circulation ought ever to be regarded. They have already felt its effects, its blighting effects, during the last three years, and passed upon it a sentence of condemnation with great unanimity. They do not desire to see it legalized and perpetuated to the continued disturbance and destruction of their interests, however it may suit the purposes of those in power to deal thus recklessly with the business of the country and the freedom of the citizen.

Neither have I the vanity to believe that it is within the scope of any ability of mine to enlighten the public mind. This may be, it must be admitted, a very fit object of discussion here. But upon the matters embraced in this project, the mind of the people of this country has long been occupied with intense anxiety. It has met them in all their daily concerns, and they have everywhere encountered in it an enemy to their industry, their welfare, and their happiness; until, from a state of unexampled prosperity, every branch of industry is in the depths of distress, and the whole land is pale. That this reverse, this searching reverse, which has reached the humblest citizen, destroying his employment, and reducing or taking away his means of subsistence, is owing to the measures of the Administration, I have no doubt whatever. Sufficient, however, is it to know, that these measures and this distress have been coexistent. They have gone hand in hand together. Precisely as the Government has advanced in its schemes and contrivances, the prosperity of the country has receded, until we are as if we had been struck with famine or pestilence. The consummation has been felt, bitterly felt, for the last three years, and is still upon us That period will be marked as the darkest and most disastrous in our history, being the very period when the powers of the Government have been employed and exercised with the keenest instinct of the love of rule, to break down the institutions which were found suited to our condition, to disturb and uproot our accustomed ways of business, to place themselves in opposition and contradiction to what the people have chosen, approved, and practised with perfect success, and to substitute them by dogmas, false in themselves, false, and over and over again falsified in all that they promised for the public benefit, and only true in their secret efficacy to undermine our free Constitution, and aggrandize our rulers, and thus to change our Government into something more in the resemblance of the arbitrary Governments of the old world. The public purse is now in the hands of the Executive, and so it has been for the last three years. The circulation and the currency have been under the control of the Executive for almost ten years. During all that period, they have known neither rest or peace. Shock after shock has fallen upon them, until the fabric of credit and confidence, constructed by the wise and well-directed labors of years, has been broken down and destroyed. The Sub-Treasury is but the representative of the ruins of that fabric. It is the poor residuum of the experiments upon the fine gold of public credit and national prosperity, which have perished in the heat of the fire kindled by the Executive and nourished with his breath. It is all that remains. The people of the United States are familiar with it, by a sad and disastrous experience, and they know that this bill, whatever pretensions it may put forward as a measure, is only to give us permanently for our portion the wreck and ruin of our prosperity. It is to continue what we have had for the last three years. The knowledge of its operation, therefore, has been sufficiently brought home to every one. Light abounds. If it be wanting any where, it is here, where it is obscured by the thick mist of party prejudice and passion, or shut out by undue deference for the wishes of the Executive. Trade, commerce, credit, the rewards of industry, the wages of labor, the value of property, the price of produce, all have been crushed together, while the Sub-Treasury has been in operation. If these be its concomitants, does any one desire to continue a system which has wrought such mischievous consequences?

My intention, as already intimated, is to address this committee, or as many of them as may favor me with a hearing. We are admonished not to expect very large audiences. I remember to have heard it once stated as a question at a public meeting, whether a man had not the constitutional right to speak? It was answered by another question: whether a man had not the constitutional right not to listen? In this excessive heat, after so protracted a debate, and with a subject which has become trite, the latter privilege is, perhaps, not an unimportant one; and no one can be blamed for availing himself of it. Still it is my intention to address this committee, and to address it upon this bill. Undoubtedly there are many high and ambitious topics connected with the subject of a very tempting nature, and inviting to a large discussion; I will avoid them, as far as possible, and confine myself to such practical views of the measure itself as seem to me to have a direct bearing on the question as to its adoption or rejection.

The supporters of this bill have, indeed, indeavored to give to it extraordinary dignity and importance; for they have asserted that it involves no less a question than whether the people are competent to govern themselves. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] answered well, that this question had long since been decided—it is no longer an open question; for the Constitution of the United States itself is a fundamental act of self-government, which bears upon its first lines that it is the work of the people themselves. It is manifestly unconstitutional to entertain a doubt upon this question, or to assert that it is not authoritatively and finally settled. The truth is, as every one acquainted with the history of this country knows, that the people of these United States, from the very earliest times, have substantially governed themselves. The early emigrants to the then colonies were abandoned to themselves at their first coming to this continent. They scarcely engaged the concern of the parent country; and one colony in Virginia, thus neglected, fell a sacrifice to the savages of the wilderness. The slight authority maintained by the British Crown over the colonies, always more or less resisted, had not deprived our ancestors of the instruction to be derived from governing themselves, while their occasional struggles for a right or a privilege served to fix deeply in them the value of the right of self-government, and a knowledge of the true principles of civil and political freedom. When the Revolution came, it found them fully instructed, entirely competent, not requiring aid in this respect from foreign Governments, and, least of all, from those which are essentially arbitrary and despotic. Their capacity for self-government was not to be tested by submitting themselves to the will of an Executive. Nor is it now to be proved by adopting his projects because they are his. Quite the contrary. Abounding in materials for human happiness, the gift of a good Providence, they deemed it their privilege and their duty to take care that these blessings should not be counteracted by the evil of bad government. The arbitrary and despotic Governments in Europe were beacons to be avoided, and not examples to be imitated. The United States separated themselves from that system; they adopted one of their own, as unlike it as possible, thereby availing themselves of the advantages of their condition to secure and consolidate the greatest sum of human happiness and freedom. It is a recent discovery, whose merit belongs to the present Executive, and entitles it to a place in the Patent Office, that we must reverse all this; that we must go to Europe, in its remotest parts even, and in its most despotic Governments, for light and for example; and that it is an evidence of defect in our system that it is not like the system of Turkey or of Spain. There is something in this too monstrous to be tolerated; it is at once to reject the bounty of Providence and the wisdom of our forefathers. Yet the chief argument of the Executive in favor of his bill is, that it is the plan of the monarchies of Europe, and especially of those in which there is not a remnant of political freedom; of some, where it is lamentably notorious that the evils of despotism are exhibited in their most odious and disgusting forms. Such a scheme may suit well, as the President says it does, in Turkey, where the sabre and the bow-string speedily settle every complaint; where human right is unknown or disregarded; where human happiness is so little cared for, that there is neither encouragement nor reward for cultivating the earth; where, in a word, a despotic and capricious will governs in every thing; where the fruits of bad government are deplorably manifest, and nothing is seen but exaction and depression.

But does it follow that it will suit the people of the United States? Claiming to be free; living under a constitutional Republican Government of their own making, and constituted for their own benefit, and not for the benefit of Government, is not the very opposite conclusion a wise and just one? Such a scheme, if it really exist, may be suited to Spain, and to Austria, or to Prussia, but it does not follow that it is suited for us. Is it not derogatory to the wisdom of our ancestors, to the character of our written Constitutions, to the free institutions which have been established for us, that we should reject their teaching to seek instruction from dark and barbarous despotisms? Their lessons may serve to build up or support a throne. They may help to aggrandize the Executive, until, in due time, he shall resemble them; but they can never be adapted to that frame of Government under which we have hitherto lived. They are odious for the source they are derived from. They are odious in themselves. To adopt them is to reject the light of our own experience—to abandon the claim we have hitherto made of presenting to mankind a steady and beneficent system, and worthy of being accepted by all who are in a condition to receive it. It is, as it were, voluntarily and ungratefully to reject the bounty of Providence, which, more than the wisdom of man, has placed us in circumstances to maintain and enjoy the freest and happiest Government the world has ever seen.

Those who coolly argue for the reduction of the wages of labor, and would persuade us that, if all other things be reduced in proportion, the reward of industry is not substantially diminished, lose sight of two great and important considerations. The first of these, which one would suppose too obvious to have escaped their attention, is, that exactly as this reduction takes place the value of capital is increased to the capitalists. If every thing else be reduced one-half, capital is doubled; the other is a great and important political consideration, intimately connected with that just mentioned.

The relation of wages to capital is one of the chief elements of our happiness, and one of the main supports of our free form of government. It preserves that equality upon which our free institutions so much depend. It raises the industrious laborer to a higher station that he can reach in any other part of the world; it places him nearer to the highest; he is worth more in his own estimation, and in the estimation of others; he has motives for exertion, too; there is nothing beyond his reach. He and his children may reasonably aspire to the highest stations and employments, if they qualify themselves by their conduct to deserve it. Man, as man, is worth more here; he feels in a higher degree his dignity, he is capable of enjoying equality; and, under the influence of this feeling, appreciates and maintains the institutions he lives under. Whoever would voluntarily seek to destroy this relation—to reduce the industrious laboring class to the degraded state in which they are kept in other parts of the world—endangers the equilibrium of our Government, and puts at risk our freedom and our happiness. I would not advocate the compulsory advance of wages, because I know it would be futile and impracticable; but as long as they will maintain themselves at an elevation above the wages of labor elsewhere, he is not a wise friend of his country who would endeavor by any means to force them down. The political economist may tell us, as he has told us, that this would enable us to enter into competition with foreign manufacturers, and thus increase the national wealth. But national wealth is a poor equivalent for what we should sacrifice in thus obtaining it. I despise every system of political economy which proposes no higher or other object than to increase the sum of wealth. Human happiness is of far greater importance; every scheme that would risk it for the sake of wealth is ill-conceived. Occupation duly rewarded; instruction; moral improvement; a prospect, with adequate exertion, of bettering one's condition; the right cultivation and indulgence of the feelings and the affections which God has given us—these are what a good parent seeks to cultivate in his family, even though it be at some expense and loss of money. What is true of the domestic circle is true in large circles of society; and, therefore, again I say, I despise every system, and every argument, which looks only to the accumulation of wealth. High wages are the glory of our condition, and they are its security. We should desire to continue them as long as possible. Let the springs flow as they now do, to spread a cheerful abundance among the classes who labor, rather than to be forced up from them to fill the large reservoirs which are too apt to be deemed the representatives of wealth. Do not disturb the moral and political equilibrium; let money go if it will; but do not needlessly, in order to recover it, waste the materials for happiness, which, once lost, can never be recovered.

Leaving these considerations for the present, I proceed to the more immediate consideration of the measure itself. The ostensible object of the bill is to be learned from the title, which is an act to "provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue."

This title does not profess to be either an amendment to, or a partial alteration in, any existing system. It must be, then, either an original provision, founding a Treasury system, none having been before in existence, or it must be a total change. That it is not an original provision every one knows. That branch of the service was long since provided for, by arrangements hitherto deemed to be entirely adequate. It is then a change. The duty seems, therefore, to be imposed upon those who offer it, to point out the defects in the former system, and to show how they are, by this bill, to be corrected or supplied. No such thing has been done or attempted.

The real object of the measure may be collected from the provisions of the bill; more fully, perhaps, from the exposition of its supporters. They may be thus stated: 1st. To place the public treasure from the time it is paid by the citizen, during its stay in the Treasury, and until its final disbursement, entirely in the hands and keeping of individuals. 2d. The individuals so to be entrusted to be appointed and removed by the President; so that, in effect, the whole treasure of the public will be immediately subject to his power, by reason of his power over those who hold it. 3d. To separate the concerns of the Treasury and circulation of the Government from the concerns and currency and business of the people; so that they may flow in separate and distinct channels, never intermingling with each other. The treasure of the Government, from the time it is drawn from the pockets of the people, will give no aid or support to their transactions, but be kept entirely apart. It will give no nourishment to trade and commerce; it will afford no help to industry; and it will be distinguished by being always the best; while the people must be satisfied to make use for their own purposes of such as they can get. A distinction is thus to be established, contrary to all former opinions and experience, and contrary to the very genius and nature of our Government. 4th. In order to make this separation more perfect, to put an end to all intercourse with banks—to make no use of them as depositories, nor in any case to receive their paper; and, what is not the least striking feature in the system, no distinction is made between good and bad banks—those which pay specie and those which do not—but equally to condemn and reprobate them all. 5th. For this purpose, to repeal the resolution of April, 1817, by which the paper of specie paying banks is made receivable in dues to the Government. 6th. After a limited time to receive and pay nothing but gold and silver, and in the mean time to require a rapidly increased proportion of coin in receipts and payments. These are the principal objects; there are some other little matters which may be incidentally noticed, but they do not require to be now specified.

The real effect of the bill, as has been already said, is to perpetuate what has existed for three years past; what that will be we may judge from our experience during that period. That it will not cure or relieve any of the evils which have been experienced, and now press so heavily on every portion of the country, is quite manifest; it is not a remedy; it is but a continuance of the disease.

The final objects professed by the friends of this bill, so far as they can be collected from their publications and their speeches, are these: to give, as they allege, greater steadiness to the concerns of the Treasury; and, secondly, to introduce the use of gold and silver. To what extent they would make this change does not clearly appear, nor are they perhaps agreed. Some would be satisfied with nothing short of the entire banishment of paper, and the total destruction of banks, while others seem to suppose that they may be partially retained and used. The act of the Government obviously favors the former. The real end of the whole project is obvious enough. It will be a total failure, or it will lead to that worst of all public evils, the establishment of a great Government bank, managed by the Executive branch of the Government, and spreading its influence and power over every department of the interest and concerns of the country.

Looking to this measure, however, as it professes to be—the establishment of a Treasury system—there are certain principles on which such a system ought to be constructed, about which it is impossible there should be any difference of opinion. First, there should be economy—security against needless and wasteful expenditure. The reason is plain: every expense which is unnecessary, whatever may be the amount of it, is so much additional tax laid upon the people, and laid to no purpose, or worse. It is so much money taken from their pockets, for which there is no return. It is money unavoidably used for the purposes of corruption, for it is paid for no real service. Secondly, there should be safety—security for the keeping of the public treasure, to the utmost attainable perfection, and for the same reason, that whatever is lost, is an additional tax upon the people, for which they have no return. Besides, it is demoralizing, by the seductive temptations it offers to those who are charged with the custody of the public treasure, as well as to those who may seek to avail themselves of their immunities, by soliciting and seducing them to violate their trusts. Thirdly, with economy and safety, it should combine all possible regard for the convenience and ease of the people.

Our Government requires, in an especial manner, attention to these important objects. What is Government here? Our nation is a great family, selecting from itself some of its members to administer its common affairs for the benefit of the whole. They contribute from the common substance to this administration, but they ought to contribute not one dollar more than is essential, and what is so contributed ought to be faithfully kept and honestly applied. It is not contributed for the ease or the advantage of the Government, nor to promote their enjoyment or their indulgence, but for the common benefit of all. And be it remembered, further, it is a contribution from what they have, a portion of their own; not something better than they have themselves, and which they are to buy for the purpose of making their payments. If they use convertible bank paper, and are satisfied with it, in the transaction of their business, the Government ought also to receive and be satisfied with it, in payment by the people. It is contrary to the compact itself, that in this respect there should be any distinction, and especially that there should be a distinction in favor of the Government. It unnecessarily and injuriously elevates the Government above the people, makes a separation between them, and destroys that sympathy which an elective Republican Government like ours ought at all times to feel, in whatever affects the body of the people. Nor is this all: it abstracts a portion from the Commonwealth of the country, for the exclusive use of the Government. The people have no benefits from it; it enters not at all into their concerns. Two separate circulations are maintained at their cost, as if the circulation of the people were unworthy to associate with the circulation for the Government. For this there is no necessity whatever. The Government can be supplied, and ought to be contented to be supplied, from the channels which flow among the people. There should be one circulation for all, and it should extend through all, the Government, like the heart in man, receiving the first supply, but, like the heart also, appropriating the contribution not to its own exclusive use, but exerting its whole energy in sending the wholesome living current through every part of the system. In such inquiries, little light can be derived from the examples of Governments differently constituted. Their principle is different from ours. Their objects and ends are different; they maintain themselves by power and force, and they accumulate power and force by every effort they can employ, in order that they may maintain themselves in defiance of the people. Their object is to keep down the people—to prevent them from doing any thing for themselves—to keep as wide a separation as possible between the Government and the people. We might as well upon this question have sent a mission to consult with savage and uncivilized tribes. I wonder, indeed, that the search was not extended still further—that they did not send to inquire for our instruction among the Hottentots and the Malays. If, indeed, they had advanced beyond even these to the wall of China, they might have found, in the Celestial Empire, the very thing they desire—pure silver for the Government, and base metal for the people.

Let us see how far this project of a Treasury is conformed to either of the great and undeniable requisites before mentioned. It will be found to outrage them all; and, if I mistake not, to outrage the plainest dictates of common sense and experience.

1. THE EXPENSE.

This is a very material inquiry; for every additional expenditure is an additional tax upon the citizen. Every unnecessary and useless expenditure is a wasteful misapplication of his means, and a positive wrong to him. And this is especially the case when the money exacted from him in taxes is employed to pay officers who are not wanted, or to pay them more than they ought to receive. This is the worst kind of sinecure—not that the officers have nothing to do, but that what they have to do brings no benefit to the people; or, which is still worse, does them a positive injury. It may be that they will contribute to the ease, the convenience, and the strength, or, if you please, as in monarchies, to the ornament and dignity of the Executive branch of the Government—to the splendor of the head. But do they inure to the use and happiness of the people? Do they advance the interests of the nation? Are they in furtherance of the principles of our free republican institutions? Quite the contrary. They tend directly to pervert and destroy the true character of our Constitution, and to assimilate us more nearly to a monarchy, with its ease, its splendor, magnificence, and sinecures, purchased with the blood and the toil of the subject. Every dollar taken for such purposes from the citizen is to purchase a weapon for his destruction. Expense of the sort ought to be guarded against with a vigilance even beyond the value of the money, as endangering all that we hold dear.

This bill, then, I object to, as opening a new source of expenditure, and a new claim for contributions by the citizen, to which no definite limits can be assigned. They will go on continually increasing. I object to it because it is for the establishment of new offices and new officers throughout the whole Union, who are entirely unnecessary, because the work for which they are alleged to be created has been, and can be, done without any expense at all. And I object to it because these offices and these officers are to be dependent upon the Executive, and subject to his will. It is worse than a wasteful expenditure, it is positively noxious and destructive.

The expenses of this scheme are of two descriptions—those which are set forth in the bill, and those which do not appear, but are concealed in its provisions. These latter require to be searched for; they are not fairly disclosed, but seem to be kept out of sight, as if it were desired that public attention should not be turned to them. They may be arranged into two classes—those which can be estimated, and those which cannot. The latter are the most dangerous. You authorize a new expenditure, but cannot even conjecture what it will amount to—you cannot foresee what new burden will be laid upon the people to pay it; and you blindly authorize it without computing, or even pretending to be able to compute, its weight. Only an approximate statement can be attempted. Of one thing, however, we may be sure, and that is, that any such statement will fall short of the truth. The actual expenditure will exceed any estimate.

Let us, nevertheless, endeavor to get some glimpse of the new branch of expenditure to be created, beginning with the expenses, of which the amount is given in the bill.

First. There are four officers with high-sounding titles, borrowed from England, and hitherto unknown among us.

A receiver-general at New York, with a salary of	-	$4,000
Do. at Boston, do.	- -	2,500
Do. at Charleston, do.	- -	2,500
Do. at St. Louis, do.	- -	2,500
The Treasurer of the Mint at Philadelphia to have an increase of	- - - -	500
The Treasurer of the Mint at New Orleans to have an increase of	- - - - - -	1,000
		$13.000
Ten clerks, at $800 a year each	- - - -	8.000
Making a total, yearly, of	-	$21,000

No one believes that ten clerks will suffice; but let that pass. We must not, because we are in the habit of talking of millons, disregard this sum for its smallness. All accumulations, however large, are made up of small sums. Waste, too, is generally in small sums. This false estimate is, of all things, to be guarded against by States as well as by individuals, who would practise a true economy. No man can afford to throw away a dollar, nor can a State or nation. The watchfulness they must observe, should be directed chiefly to this point. The moment a habit of waste is indulged, it will become ascendant, and finally produce boundless profusion. There is no such thing as small and great in these matters; or, if there be, the settled maxim is to take care of things which seem to be small.

But is this small? Is a sum of 21,000 a year to be disregarded—to be beneath our attention—not worth considering? We must remember that it is the money of the citizen we are talking of, contributed from the income of his capital or labor, and intrusted to us to be used for his benefit, and not to be wasted. We should count every dollar, and turn it to the best account.

Is twenty-one thousand dollars a year so very small a sum? Let us pause, and consider a little. Small as it may appear, it is the interest, at 5 per cent. of a capital of four hundred thousand dollars and upwards. How many days' labor would be required to pay it each year? At one dollar a day, and allowing three hundred working days in a year, it would take the labor of one man for seventy years, or of seventy men for one year. How many barrels of flour would be required at the present prices, to pay it? Five thousand two hundred and fifty barrels, at four dollars a barrel; eight hundred and forty bales of cotton, at six and a quarter cents a pound. Is this a sum not worth regarding? Government must have made rapid strides in extravagance (as it really has done) when such an argument can receive any countenance. It is time there was a change.

But every one knows the difference there is between the beginning and the end, in such matters, if indeed there be any end, as long as money can any how be raised. Expense begets expense. It always increases—it does not diminish. This will be more fully exhibited presently. In the mean time, let me ask, does any one believe that this scheme is to be stationary? Will it not constantly grow in its claims upon the Treasury—more receivers-general be wanted, more clerks, more officers of all descriptions, high and low, with all the contingent allowances which figure so prominently in our accounts? Now, the whole of this expense is throw away, or worse—it is unnecessary. The public money can be kept without expense. It can be kept without expense, nearer to the people, and in a manner more accomodating to them, as will be seen hereafter. It will be further from the Executive, and less under his control, which he may think an objection, but to every right thinking Republican must be a high recommendation. Let us not, then, despise the twenty-one thousand dollars a year. It is quite too much to be thrown away.

The next thing to be considered is the cost of the gold and silver to be supplied for this use, that is to say, for the exclusive use of the Government. According to the bill, it is to be supplied, and for this use alone. As if it might be debased or contaminated by mixing with the money of the people, it is to be kept "without loaning or using." No part of it will enter into, or support, or nourish the business of the country. It is to be kept apart for the higher uses of Government alone, to circulate only within that elevated sphere. The appropriation of it is the same as if it were in furniture, or in fabrics of gold and silver. Who is to supply it? The people. How are they to obtain it? They must buy it with their labor or their produce. What will it cost them? I put it here, under this head, because it is computable, or nearly so. No one is weak enough to suppose that it is to be had for nothing. What, then, I repeat, will it cost? The cost of this gold and silver will consist of two parts: First, the ordinary rate of profit in the country upon the sum so to be employed. Second, the wear and tear and loss of the metals in their use. The ordinary rate of profit upon capital, as indicated by the rate of interest, differs in different parts of the Union. In Pennsylvania it is six per cent. In New York it is seven per cent. In Louisiana the legal interest is six per cent. the conventional interest whatever the parties may agree upon, not exceeding ten per cent. What it is in Alabama and Mississippi I do not know, but I presume that in both the actual interest of money is, at the present time, higher than that fixed by law. It would be a fair average to call it seven per cent. per annum throughout the country. The second item of cost, that is, the wear and tear and loss or destruction of the metals, is estimated in the supplement to the Encyclopædia Britannica, article Money, at one-fiftieth, or two per cent. I am aware that, in an essay published some years ago, and ascribed to Mr. Gallatin, he expresses an opinion that this is too much. Between these conflicting views, I do not undertake to decide. We must then see what is the amount upon which these charges are to be estimated. The President, in his message to Congress at the opening of the present session, says, that subsequent investigation has shown him that it will not be more than from four to five millions of dollars—say five millions of dollars. The cost, then, at seven per cent. would be $350,000 a year. If two per cent. be added for wear and tear and loss, it will make a further sum of $100,000 a year—giving a total of $450,000 a year. Add to this the above $25,000, it makes the total cost $471,000 a year. But what assurance have we that the amount will be limited to $5,000,000? We have seen the surplus in the Treasury amount up to $40,000, besides what was outstanding in the hands of receivers and disbursing officers. In my opinion, we cannot safely assume less than double the amount stated by the President as the requirement of this service. That would be $10,000,000; the cost of which would be $921,000 a year—almost a million of dollars. Under this head, not including extras or contingencies, nor the certain growth and increase of this branch of expenditure, every one will agree that this is far too much to be thrown away. No one will doubt that, as a beginning, it is extremely dangerous. The maximum is not attained at once. The expenditure goes on continually increasing. But, apply this amount, small as it is in comparison with what it will be hereafter, to labor and produce, what will it require to pay it every year? The labor of one man for three hundred and thirty-three years, or 333 men for one year—forty thousand bales of cotton!—250,000 barrels of flour!

But we have not done with the expenses. The offices and officers, as already stated, will be continually increased. Look at the other branches of your Government, and see if this has not been invariably the case. What guarantee have you that it will not be so here? I will have occasion presently to exhibit a specimen of what has happened in one of the Departments of the Government, which ought to inspire caution and distrust in any assurances to that effect.

Again: Buildings are to be erected and altered; vaults and safes are to be provided; and various other things which will be found in this bill. Further buildings will, no doubt, be required; further alterations and provisions. What will they cost? No one has pretended to offer us an estimate; and, if it were offered, we could not rely upon it. Look at our recent experience here, in Washington, under the immediate eye of the Government, and under our own inspection. The first appropriation for the Treasury buildings, in 1836, was $100,000. The estimated cost was understood to be $450,000, afterwards enlarged to $500,000. In the year 1837, $257,000 more were appropriated; in 1839, $100,000; in 1840, $105,000. These sums make a total of $562,000, exceeding the enlarged estimate. Yet the expenditures have not stopped here; nor have we yet done with them. $34,000 were taken for this use from the appropriations for light-houses. With these and other sums, there have been now expended $696,000; and the building is not yet completed. The architect has applied to the Committee on the Public Buildings for an additional appropriation of $100,000 for the south wing. If a like sum should be required for the north wing, of $100,000, we should then have a total of $896,000. And a gentleman who is well acquainted with the present condition of the work, and its probable future demands, has informed me that this work, originally estimated at $450,000, will cost more than one million of dollars. The first appropriation for the Patent office, in 1836, was $108,000; there have been appropriated for it altogether $408,000. How much more it will cost, I cannot pretend to say; but I am assured that the Treasury building and the Patent office together will not cost less than one million five hundred thousand dollars. Such is the progress of expenditure, compared with the appropriation and estimate for buildings. Of the buildings, and alterations and repairs, required for this Independent Treasury, we have no estimate at all. In the 26th section, there is an appropriation of $10,000; but we have just seen that an appropriation is no evidence of what is to be the cost or expenditure. It is but the beginning of the expenditure, to be carried on, and expended indefinitely. Applying to this appropriation, however, the measure, if so it can be called, afforded by the Treasury building and the Patent office, we cannot see in this appropriation of $10,000, a less expenditure than almost ten times the amount. So much for the buildings and alterations proposed to be made.

Then, again: We are no longer to have transfers, but transportation; the carrying of the public treasure from place to place at the public expense. I am not speaking now of the inconvenience of this method of proceeding, nor of the unreasonableness of the Treasury in refusing to avail itself of the means afforded by the business and circulation of the country, and withholding the aid and support it could give to them; this belongs to another head to be treated hereafter; I am speaking now only of the expense; no man can pretend to say what it will be, but we have conclusive evidence that it will far outgo all just calculation and allowance. I refer to a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury of the 24th of February last, on the expenses of the Government of Wiskonsin. Among the extraordinary items in that paper, there are some which contain an instructive admonition upon the question we are now considering. Among them I find the following:

"J. De Selhorst, for transporting specie - -	$368 55
Do do do - -	158 00
Do do do - -	227 50
Do do do - -	114 00
Do do do - -	125 00
Do do do - -	8 00
William B. Slaughter, (the Secretary of the Territory at a salary of $1000 per annum,) for his services and expenses for transporting $7000 in specie	200 00
William B. Slaughter, expenses in going to St. Louis, &c. - - - - - -	100 00
William B. Slaughter, for interest on money loaned	55 00
William B. Slaughter, for expense in transporting money from Milwaukie - - - -	510 00
William B. Slaughter, for procuring money on a protested draft - - - - - -	114 00
William B. Slaughter, for going to St. Louis, negotiating, receiving, and transporting $20,000, and disbursing the same, (paying the Legislature,) -	800 00
William B. Slaughter, expense in collecting a Government draft on land office - - - -	100 00"

Some of these, it must be admitted, have been suspended by the accounting officers, on what ground it does not appear, but they are all charges.

The charges for De Selhorst, to the amount of $1,209 75, being entirely for the transportation, appear to have been allowed. What proportion they bore to the sum transported, appears only in a single instance, where $200 were allowed for the transportation of $7000, almost 3 per cent. on the amount; equal to six months' interest. In the absence of any better ground, every one may judge from this what is to be the cost of the management of the whole public revenue under the same system of transportation, and what are to be the pickings of the officers out of it. They need only further consider that this is the money of the people, which is to be thus sacrificed, extracted from them by taxation, and that it is wholly unnecessary and useless, and they will then see a small portion of the enormity proposed by this bill. It is absolute waste, without any benefit whatever to the country, to incur the expense of transportation, and the loss that must arise from selling drafts, where drafts are used, for the Government well knows that its transfers can be made, and have been made, without one dollar's expense.

In estimating the expenses of the bill, we must not, as a part of them, forget the injury that will be done to the circulation and business of the country. Whatever they amount to, is fairly to be considered as a part of the expense of this system. If it should interfere with and disturb, as it will do, the transactions of individuals; if it should harass and obstruct the circulation of the banks; if, by its operation, it should constantly menace them with demands for specie, against which they can make no provision, because they are uncertain in time and amount; if it should thus interfere with their usefulness to the country, whatever losses arise from these or similar causes, are fairly to be considered as a part of the aggregate expense of this measure.

Defalcations, too, are an additional and certain item of expense; wherever money is entrusted, there is opportunity afforded for abusing the trust; and unhappily we are admonished by present and past experience that such opportunity is found to be a temptation too strong for human infirmity to resist. Defalcations are as regular as decay and death in a forest. The fairest character, as will be seen hereafter, is no adequate assurance against them. But of this hereafter.

In considering this matter of expense, we must not overlook the ominous and alarming warning in the 27th section of this bill: "That for the payment of the expenses authorized by this act, other than those herein provided for, a sufficient sum of money may be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated." Here is an unlimited and undefined authority given to some person—to whom, the bill does not say—to take out of the Treasury whatever sum of money he may deem to be sufficient, in addition to what was before specified in the act. This is a plain admission that the expenses to be incurred under this act are not disclosed in the bill; that there are other expenses which its framers are unable or unwilling to make known; which they are unable or unwilling to define or to limit, and for which they lay open the whole Treasury of the United States to the discretion of the Executive.

There is no conceivable amount of expenditure which is not warranted by this section. To my mind it is plainly unconstitutional. The Constitution, jealous of the public treasure, and careful that it shall not be drawn from the Treasury but under the immediate authority of the Representatives of the people by whom it is contributed, declares that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law. Can it be consistent with this provision, with its terms, and still more with its spirit and true object, that the Treasury shall be laid open to any one to take from it whatever he may think fit? What is this but to delegate to him the very power, in all its plenitude, which was intended to be exercised only by Congress? How can it, with any propriety, be termed an appropriation by law to draw money out of the Treasury, when the law neither specifies nor defines the purposes to which it is to be applied, nor in any manner restricts the amount to be taken out? It is a palpable contradiction; or, which is worse, a manifest evasion of the Constitution. It is a precedent of the most dangerous character. It could never be allowed, if it could be allowed at all, but under circumstances of such urgent and instant danger as left not a moment for deliberation. No such thing exists here. There is no urgency in the case. Three years have been employed in maturing this project. Session after session it has been urged upon Congress, and it has claimed to be ready for their adoption from the time of their extra meeting in 1837. Hitherto it has been rejected. But every rejection has been a pause for further deliberation and for fuller preparation, if necessary, by those who have originated and espoused this bill. Every provision, and every word in it, has, of course, been duly weighed, and it comes to us, at last, with a determination that not a letter shall be altered. We must take the bill exactly as it is. No amendment in it will be permitted. It is of evil augury that among the results of all this premeditation we should find one which disregards or evades one of the most important provisions in the fundamental law of our Government. And this, too, without any thing in the shape of information—any thing pretending to be an estimate—any thing to disclose the intentions of those who are to execute the law, as to the extent to which they mean to carry this delegated power over the whole Treasury of the United States. There is a kindred provision equally extraordinary, and to my mind highly objectionable, in the 14th section of the bill, displaying an equal disregard of the true principles upon which the Government under our Constitution ought to be administered. The Secretary and his subordinate officers are invested with full power to decide what "necessary additional expenses for clerks, fire-proof chests, or vaults, or other necessary expenses of safe-keeping and disbursing said moneys," shall be allowed.

This power, like the former, seems studiously to exclude the knowledge and the interference of Congress. In both, we discern the same disposition which characterizes the whole of this measure, of transferring all the power of the Government into the hands of the President and the officers of his appointment.

No member of either House can inform himself, nor can he inform his constituents, how much money is to be expended, nor at what point the expenditure is to cease. Neither is there any accountability, the whole being left to the discretion of the Executive and his subordinates—that discretion is the sole measure. Whether they expend one thousand dollars, or one hundred thousand dollars, or one million of dollars, or ten millions of dollars, there is nothing in this act which does not leave it to their discretion. If there were no constitutional objection, still such confiding and incautious legislation can not be too much deplored as a departure from first principles, and an alarming step towards aggrandizing the Executive at the expense of the power of the people by their representatives.

But to return to the question of expense. I have said that, in my judgment, this scheme will not cost the country less than a million of dollars a year at first. We must bear in mind, too, that expense is productive of expense. If you establish a new branch of expense, you know that it will go on increasing and enlarging, so that the product will far outstrip the parent stock in size. There is no calculating the growth of an ill-judged expenditure, nor what it will finally come to, however humble and diminutive it may appear in the beginning. Two questions then arise. Is the country in a condition to bear a new imposition? Does our experience encourage us to impose a new burden by any confidence that we can keep it within bounds?

As to the first of these questions, it is not my intention to say much just now. It is quite unnecessary. Every one knows that the country is in distress—deep distress—felt more severely in some parts than in others, but pervading all. Whatever it may be owing to, industry is crushed, produce sunk in value, labor without employment, and of course without reward, circulation at a stand, and every interest suffering. If there be any part which suffers more than the rest, it is the portion where the great staple of our exports is produced. Your revenue is in the same condition, and still falling off. For the payment of your current expenses, you have been obliged to contract a debt, by the issue of Treasury notes, which must probably be increased. Is this a time to impose additional burdens, to create new expenses, to make new charges upon your revenue, already charged with more than it can bear? The very reverse of all this would seem to be the obvious dictate of wisdom and patriotism. Forbear to increase the public trouble by new experiments, and new expenses, and new burdens. If you will do nothing to aid the country in its struggles for relief, at least be cautious how you aggravate its misery.

But what I have chiefly in view is the second of these inquiries. Do you find encouragement to open a new source of expense from any recent experience that you can keep it within reasonable limits? I will appeal only to facts, specific facts, put in such quantity only as to be easily intelligible, and taken from documents which cannot be denied or disputed. Let me then call your attention to a single branch of revenue only—the customs. It is amazing and it is frightful to see with what rapidity the expenses have increased within a few years past. I refer to two Treasury documents, one of the 7th July, 1838, No. 504, the other of the 11th February, 1839, No. 212. Though bearing different dates, they must be laid side by side, the one being the complement of the other, and both necessary in order to get at the truth. The one gives only the expenditure, the other the amount collected.

Here is an abstract of receipts and expenditures taken from these two documents:

	Receipts.	Expenditures.
1828	$23,205,523 24	$889,527 45
1829	22,681,965 91	944,4-9 18
1830	21,922,391 39	1,006,059 95
1831	24,224,441 79	1,115,971 77
1832	28,465,237 24	1,287,553 09
1833	20,032,508 91	1,341,011 72
1834	16,214,957 15	1,266,480 16
1835	19,391,310 59	1,256,197 70
1836	23,409,940 53	1,368,401 67
1837	11,169,290 39	1,459,501 45
1838	9,328,770 56

From this abstract it appears that the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs have gone on, continually and rapidly increasing, from 1828, until, from being in the year 1828 $889,527 45, they had risen in 1837, (the last year of which we have any account,) to $1,459,501 45. Nor is this all. From the same documents it will be seen that an additional allowance was made by law for this branch of the public service for each of the years 1833, 1834, 1835, 1836, 1837, increasing the expenditure beyond that which appears in the above abstract. The amount so appropriated and expended in the year 1837 was $37,773 69, which, being added to the above sum of $1,459,501 45, makes the total expenditure for that year in collecting the revenue from customs, $1,497,275 04.

If from this you deduct the expenditure of 1828, of $889,527 45, you find the increase to be no less than $607,747 59. Perhaps some one may suggest that there was an increased revenue collected in 1837; but such is not the fact, it was a far less amount of revenue. In 1828, the revenue from customs was $23,205,523 64, which was collected at an expense, as already shown, of $889,527 45. The revenue from customs collected in 1837 was not the half of this. It was but $11,169,290 39, and the cost of collecting it was $1,497,275 04 cents. For this extraordinary increase of expenditure in this branch of the public service, during the period of nine years, almost doubling it, no good reason has been assigned, nor is it believed can be assigned. If the expenditures in that branch of the revenue go on increasing at the same rate, in a few years there will be nothing to receive. Add to it the enormous defalcations from delinquent officers, which have occurred to it in that Department, including Swartwout's defalcation of a million and a quarter, and how much will be left? Pursuing the same course, we should in a few years be able to return a lesson to Turkey for that she has given to us, and teach the Grand Sultan how to make his revenue oppressive to his people and unproductive to his treasury. But let us make a comparison of averages, and see how the matter will stand:

Allow me to remark, however, that according to Dr. Seybert's statement, in pages 292, 293, of his statistical work, the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, from 1791 to 1810, were at the rate of 4.04 per cent. on the amount collected—say four per cent. During the four years of Mr. Adams's administration, the total amount collected was $86 357,882 15—the average for each year was $21,589 4-3 03 cents. The total expenditure for the collection for four years was $3,460,296 84. The average expenditure for each year, therefore, was $865,076 71. The total collection for the following nine years under his successors was $196,512,043 88. The average for each year, therefore, was, $21,624 660 43, nearly the same as before. The total cost of collection for these nine years was $11,096,666 09, giving an average for each year of $1,231,740 66. But this is not all. There was an extra appropriation for five years, as has been seen, of $311,884 88. The average for each of the five years is $62,376 97; add, then, to the above average of $1,231.740 66, the average for each of the five years, $62,376 97 cents, and it makes the average cost of those years $1,291,117 73. Deduct from this the average in the time of Mr. Adams's administration, $865,076 71, and it shows an average increase in the cost of collecting the revenue by customs of $429,041 02, or nearly fifty per cent. advance; this is an enormous advance. Instead of seeking for new sources of expenditure, we ought to apply ourselves diligently to discover what this increase has been owing to, and if possible to apply a corrective; for, as has been already remarked, the increase has been constantly advancing, and this fact is even more alarming than the increased average, great as it is.

In the time of Mr. Adams, the average rate of the cost of collection, it will be seen, was about four per cent.—being the same rate as from the year 1791 to 1810. He had followed in the footsteps of his truly illustrious predecessors—those who had administered the Government in its best days. He adhered to their maxims, and conducted the administration with true wisdom and economy. In the nine years immediately following, the average rate of collection is nearly six per cent.—making a difference in those nine years of nearly four millions of dollars wasted and lost by expenditure in one branch of the service. In the year 1837, the last of which we have an account, the rate is between thirteen and fourteen per cent. on the amount collected; that is, $1,497,275 for collecting $11,169,290 39. If, as has been before remarked, to this increased expense of collection you add the enormous defalcations which have been suffered, you will have a deplorable account of the revenue collected into the Treasury compared with the product of any former period. What has become of the enormous amount expended? Where has it gone? Has it been a part of the spoils? Is there encouragement in this for adding new expenses? I have not looked into the expenses of other branches of the revenue, but the glimpses we have had of them lead to the painful conclusion that there has been equal extravagance and waste in the rest. At the rate we are going on, we shall soon have nothing but expenses. I repeat it, then, is there encouragement in this for opening new sources of expense? Are we not admonished to the contrary? But I ask further—again, I ask—Is there such prosperity among the interests of the country as to allow it? What interest is not crushed? Commerce, manufactures, planting, farming, the laborer, are all in distress. And the banks, the people's own institutions, established by themselves, for their own accommodation, and adapted to their use, are they not suffering with the people, partaking of their calamity, and in distress, because the people are distressed? Much as we revile and abuse them here, they sympathize with the people. The Government alone has stood aloof, more than secure, a gainer even by the common disaster. The expenses have not been diminished, and the officers have had their salaries enhanced, by having them paid in the best currency; at the same time that, by the fall of all other things, their income has almost doubled their value.

In 1837, at the called session, when there was anguish throughout the land, the President folded his robe about him, not like Cæsar, to fall gracefully himself, but to look with graceful composure on the downfall of all about him. Recurring to that period, it seems to me as if some one had looked down from a secure eminence upon the lamentable destruction recently made by the tornado in Natchez; enjoying his own security, and desirous not to be troubled with the afflictions of the sufferers. His advice, more philosophical than humane, would be, "help yourselves, do not trouble me." I have now done, for the present, with the question of expense. I trust enough has been shown to satisfy the House that the objections on this head are of themselves sufficient to condemn the measure; that, upon this ground, if there were no other, it ought to be rejected. I proceed to the next consideration—of no less importance.

2. SAFETY.

In the organization of a Treasury Department, safety is, indeed, the very first consideration. Accordingly, it was to the security of the public treasure that General Hamilton applied his earnest attention. There is a great disposition, at times, to speak ill of this eminent statesman. Yet no one can deny him the praise of having so organized the Department, as thoroughly to accomplish its great end. Such was his comprehensive sagacity, such his far-reaching foresight, that, from the beginning to the present day, not a defect has been discovered, not an alteration has been made, though, in the revolution of parties, there has been sufficient inclination, and sufficient ability, too, to have made changes, if they had been at all admissible. But as often as his plan has been examined, his provident wisdom has been so convincingly manifested, even to his most determined opponents, that they have been obliged to confess that no change could be made which would not be for the worse. That plan, as his genius conceived and established it at the first, continues, to the present day, a lasting monument of his powers and his patriotism. What it is we shall presently see.

To the present bill, upon the ground of safety, there is deep, irremoveable, decisive objection. No one who will fairly consider its provisions can for a moment doubt that it will be wasteful and demoralizing—wasteful, because it will lead to great losses of the public money; demoralizing, because it will create temptations to embezzlement and breach of trust too strong for the infirmity of our nature to resist. In both respects, it contradicts the lessons of common sense and experience. I do not characterize it too strongly in saying that, upon its face, it is absurdly insufficient, except for increasing defalcation and embezzlement. If there be any who think the crop we have had of these too small, or the promise of future harvests of them inadequate; who desire to encourage the growth of official delinquency and the purloining or waste of the public treasure, in my judgment, they will find a powerful coadjutor in this bill. For those who would, like Hamilton, desire to guard the public money from plunder and waste, and apply it faithfully to the service of the people from whom it is raised, this bill has not a single recommendation. Let us see.

The buildings, safes, and vaults being finished, at a great expense, and the public money deposited, the key is to be delivered to an individual. The funds are forthwith to be placed in his custody. (§ 13.) The public treasure is guarded only by a key, and that key in the hands of a single individual. He may have access to it whenever he pleases, without control, and without the knowledge of any one but himself. There is no check upon him of any kind whatever. Now, I invite every man to reflect upon this, to ponder it, to realize as he ought to do that this is the main feature, nay, that it is the whole plan, to place the money of the country in the hands of individuals, without check or control. Can he give it his approbation?

The supposed checks (checks they are not, in any proper sense of the word) are alleged to be provided in certain legislative regulations and occasional examination. Of the former kind are, section 6, which simply points out the duty; section 8, requiring bonds to be given with sureties; section 17, which makes embezzlement a felony, punishable with fine and imprisonment; section 21, which prohibits exchange of funds, except for gold and silver; and section 22, which is a prohibition of future specie circulars, and a plain censure of that which was issued by the late President in 1836. Sections 12 and 13 provide, very inadequately, for occasional examinations. These provisions discover a misgiving, a want of confidence in the plan, a sense of the necessity of some colorable security which, though not in substance worth a straw, may have the appearance of a safeguard. But, neither individually nor collectively, do they constitute a check. By a check, we mean a power to restrain or hinder a man from doing wrong at the moment when he is tempted or inclined to do so. Such are the checks in the Treasury of the United States. No man can take money out of it. The concurrence of several is required; and these are checks upon one another. So effectual have they proved that not a dollar has ever been lost. But here, by this bill, the key is in the hands of one man; his single will can decide when the vault shall be opened; his single act can open it without the concurrence and without even the knowledge of any other. He goes alone, unseen, without restraint. Where is the check? In telling him beforehand that he ought not to do so; that it is criminal; that he may be found out; and, if he should be, that he will be punished? He knows all this. It is the moral law; it is the law of the land; it is the oath of office, with its solemn sanction; it is the plain duty of his office. Every defaulter has known all this, and has known that, if detected, he would be punished. Do you increase the security by a more formal declaration? Is it a check? We shall see presently, from irresistible evidence, that it is a mere pretence; for any practical purpose, not worth a straw.

Is the plan, then, safe and sufficient? Before proceeding to consider this question, however, I would ask the attention of the committee to an extraordinary and unaccountable novelty in the first and eleventh sections of this bill. The first section, after enacting that rooms, fire-proof vaults, and safes, shall be prepared in the new Treasury buildings in Washington, goes on to say, "which said rooms, vaults, and safes are hereby constituted and declared to be the Treasury of the United States." The eleventh section enacts that, under certain circumstances, the moneys in the hands of the depositaries shall be considered and dealt with "as though the said moneys were actually in the Treasury of the United States." What is the meaning of this? What is its legal effect? Has it been fully considered? Does it mean that heretofore there has been no Treasury of the United States, and henceforth there is to be one; or does it mean that the nature and character of the Treasury are to be changed? Upon these points no explanation has been given, no reason assigned. A Treasury has always existed—established by the Constitution, recognised by our laws, understood in practice, incorporated into our business, and well understood. It was not a thing of brick and mortar, of rooms, vaults, and safes, having a locality, and restrained within the narrow limits of the few designated rooms of the Treasury buildings.

The Treasury, under the Constitution and laws, is a legal being, and its legal definition is, that wherever in the United States is the treasure of the United States there is the Treasury, with all its constitutional rights, and guards, and immunities. When money is in a bank to the credit of the Treasurer, wherever the bank may be, that money is in the Treasury. When money is paid to the cashier appointed in the custom-house at New York, it is in the Treasury. The grasp of the Treasury thus reaches, secures, and guards all the money of the United States, wherever it may be within the United States, and places it within the protection of the Constitution and laws. Once in the Treasury, it cannot be drawn out but in consequence of an appropriation by law. This provision applies to the Treasury, as understood by the Constitution. No difficulty has ever been found in its application. The guard is extended, as it should be, to all the treasure of the United States. To change the character of the Treasury from a comprehensive, well defined, legal being, to a thing of brick and mortar—to narrow it down to a locality, instead of letting it, as heretofore, embrace the treasure, wherever it may be, is inconsistent with the Constitution.

Why make this extraordinary change? Is it meant that the moneys of the United States not within the Treasury building may be drawn out without an appropriation by law? Are they to be exempted from the control of Congress, and placed at the disposition entirely of the Executive officers? Is it intended to impair, if not to break down, this great safeguard of the Constitution—this cherished security for the rights of the people? Such a design is grossly unconstitutional; and, whether that be the design or not, the operation is itself a violation of the Constitution.

Without further dwelling on this objection, I proceed to the inquiry already stated—is this plan safe and sufficient? This is a great moral as well as financial question. We are bound to take care of the security of the public treasure. We are bound also to take care of the great interests of morality, so essential to our happiness and welfare. We ought, therefore, with the utmost scrupulousness, to abstain as far as possible from creating temptations which are known to be dangerous. As to this plan of entrusting money to individuals for keeping, without check or control, reason and experience concur to reprobate it. The united voice of mankind condemns it. For the present, however, I appeal only to your own experience, willing to abide by its decision. The question a priori is no longer open. Brief as our history is, our own experience is unhappily sufficient. The evidence is uniform and concurrent. Observe its weight—its conclusive weight—and say if it can be reasonably or conscientiously disregarded. Revolving in my mind the true definition of embezzlement, and how it stands distinguished from defalcation, I happened to turn to the dictionary, and there I found it stated thus: embezzlement "differs from stealing and robbing in this: that the latter implies a wrongful taking of another's goods, but embezzlement denotes the wrongful appropriation and use of what came into possession by right. It is not uncommon for men entrusted with public money to embezzle it." Here you see experience has established a common truth so clearly as to find a place in a dictionary of our language; that truth is, that as surely as men are entrusted with public money, public money will be more or less embezzled. The child that is sent to a dictionary for instruction finds the truth there; advancing in life, his own experience teaches him that it is the truth, and it becomes at last incorporated with our thoughts as a settled maxim.

Every defalcation, however, it is proper to remark, is not an embezzlement; in the latter there is a felonious intent, it is stealing, except that there is not a compliance with the technical requisite of taking. I will not attempt to graduate the criminality of these offences; but in cases of defalcation, it often happens, perhaps most frequently, that there is no felonious intention, that is, no intention finally to deprive the owner of his property. The delinquent, under the influence of strong temptation—his own necessities—a prospect of advantage—the solicitation of friends—is induced to violate his trust; he persuades himself that he is doing no wrong, for he is convinced that he will be able to return the deposite in due time. If at such a moment he could be made to feel that he will never be able to restore what he takes, he would probably abstain from taking it. But with no human eye to see him, assured of secrecy, and deluded into the belief that no harm will be done, he yields to a temptation whose criminality he does not sufficiently perceive. There is on this account the greater snare, and the greater danger. Good men are betrayed by it to their ruin; character is no adequate security.

Now let us examine the evidence—we begin with that furnished by our own statements; first let us turn to document No. 10, furnished to us at the present session by the Secretary of the Treasury. The tables in that document only come down to the year 1836, inclusive; the total number of defaulters in page 8 is two thousand seven hundred and sixty, in that class. An immense number, it must be admitted, and an appalling statement for those who would confide the whole treasure of the United States to individual keeping. The total loss is $4,955,573 56, "loss per head" (for the Secretary puts it down as if he were numbering cattle) in the civil department $3,680; in the military and naval department $1,613; and this, after allowing a deduction of 20 per cent. for credits they might probably show themselves to be entitled to. The table just referred to is of disbursing officers; the next table, No. 2, is of collectors, a sort of sub-treasurers, confided in for keeping the public moneys, as the sub-treasurers are to be under this act. The number of defaulters is 367; the total loss $2,033,549 81, not including, however, the defalcation of Swartwout, which is a million and a quarter more. "The loss per head" is $5,737. We next come to the accounts of postmasters, in page 15, who are also a sort of sub-treasurers, and here we find a large list of defaulters; the total number is not less than 626; the total amount of default $377,493 56; and certainly we can derive no hope of improvement from our most recent experience; on the contrary, the last is the worst. Of the total amount of the default of postmasters, $142,250 43, occurred in the four years, from 1833 to 1836, inclusive. The grand total, adding Mr. Swartwout's default, is no less than $8,622,616! From another document it appears that the delinquent receivers from the sales of the public lands are 66. This table will be found in the report of a committee of this House at the session of 183[illegible], '39, No 313, vol. 2, page 143. Surely these things have not been fully weighed, nor the admonition duly considered by those who would recommend the extension of individual confidence in the keeping of the public money.

Yet this is only a part of the evidence. I mean of the evidence we have before us, in our own proceedings, testified by our own document, and constantly in our sight. In the year 1817 occurred the case of Theron Rudd, clerk of the district court of the district of New York, or of one of the districts in that State. He was a Sub-Treasurer, for he had the custody of the treasure belonging to the suitors in that court, public and private. At this time he had received into his hands, in the course of three or four years, a large sum of money, partly belonging to the United States, and partly to private suitors. It was not forthcoming. In the year 1818 a committee of this House made a report upon the subject, No. 138, 1st session 15th Congress. In that report the facts are fully stated. I will not take up the time of the committee with reading it at length, but will only bring to your view the concluding sentence: "By all which it doth appear to your committee that the funds of the court have not been faithfully applied, but that they have been most grossly and nefariously purloined." The amount due to the United States of the money thus purloined, was $64,906 15; to private claimants $52,486, making a total of $117,307 01. This, it will be borne in mind, was the case of a public officer, appointed under the authority of the United States. By and by I will show how the recurrence of such purloining was provided against. Then we had a defalcation by a clerk of this House. In both the instances thus stated, the Treasury of the United States was the sufferer. The accounts furnished to us do not show the extent of defalcation among depositaries of this description. They are, therefore, a very inadequate representation, large as the sum is, of the total loss sustained by the Treasury of the United States. Then it will be recollected we had a defalcation by the sergeant-at-arms of this House. Have these things been duly considered, in framing the present bill? They go to the very heart of it—they show it to be founded upon a false theory, contradicted by our own experience, as well as the experience of mankind.

But there is still much more evidence, far more than can be known to any individual, and far more than, if I knew it all, it would be possible to bring before you. "It is not uncommon," as the dictionary tells us, "for men entrusted with the public money, to embezzle it." It is so common, as you have seen, that the history is too long to be read, or to be listened to. Some of the evidence, however, I can vouch, and for the great remainder, must refer to those who will task their recollection. Doubtless there is no man present who has not known of instances. I can refer only to a very small part. I begin with Pennsylvania. The most striking and instructive instance there happens, also, to be one of great notoriety. It is the case of John Nicholson. In the year 1784, according to my recollection, Mr. Nicholson was a clerk in one of the public offices in Pennsylvania. He recommended himself to notice by his integrity, his assiduity, and his capacity. About the period just mentioned, he framed a law for establishing the accounting department of the Commonwealth, which met with the legislative sanction, and he was appointed by the Legislature to be Comptroller. He enjoyed the highest confidence, and for a long time I really believe he deserved it. But, unfortunately for him, and for the Commonwealth too, too much was confided to him. He was entrusted with the public money, and with public securities. In less than ten years he was found to be a defaulter to an amount exceeding considerably one hundred thousand dollars. Judgments were obtained against him by the State; and out of them have arisen still continuing controversies, reaching great numbers of persons, but known by his name. The remainder of his history it is not material to revert to. Then, at a subsequent period, we had a delinquent treasurer; his name I need not mention. The case will be found in some of the books of reports.

We have had instances, too, not of so public a nature, but equally demonstrative of the insufficiency and the danger of individual confidence. In the Northern Liberties Bank there was an individual employed only as a clerk or bookkeeper, but, from the excellence of his character and his uncommon qualifications, almost entrusted with the entire management. For himself and for his friends, in violation of his trust, under the influence of temptation, he withdrew nearly half the capital of the bank. In this state things were when the directors first discovered his delinquency. We had also a recent instance in the Schuylkill Bank. We had a case of a railroad company, in which the President appropriated to his own use the means of the company to the amount, I think, of four hundred thousand dollars. These are all instances in which confidence reposed in individuals was betrayed. They are instances, too, in which the individuals were deemed worthy of the confidence. I do not doubt that they were in the beginning. They were ruined by the confidence placed in them.

I now come to some very memorable and painful cases, which have occurred in the State of Virginia, and made a deep and permanent impression. Important as they are, still, if I thought there were wounds that would be opened by reviving the recollection of them, I would abstain from doing so; but I am told that, after this length of time, there is no danger on this score. The first of these was the case of General Preston, a treasurer of Virginia. I will give the account of it from a paper which lies before me, furnished by a gentleman well acquainted with the whole matter.

General John Preston was first appointed Treasurer of Virginia by the Executive, in the recess of the Legislature, in October, 1808. He was reappointed by the Legislature to the office in January, 1809; and thenceforth, successively every year till January, 1819, when Jerman Baker was appointed his successor. Of Gen. Preston's malversation in office, no suspicion had arisen in any quarter till about Christmas, 1818. He had been, previously, always and universally esteemed a man of spotless integrity and honor. He was one of a numerous family of the most respectable people in Virginia; all of whom, with the exception of himself, are yet without a stain. He was a man in easy circumstances, of simple and frugal habits, and apparently free from the dominion of any strong passion whatever, and from every vice that could offend against good morals or good manners. He was, I should think, at the termination of his public service as treasurer, about 65 years of age. The detection of his defalcation came upon the public like a clap of thunder in a cloudless day.

The amount of the deficit in the Treasury, at the time he went out of office, was $132,588 of public money entrusted to his safekeeping, as Treasurer of the Commonwealth; in addition, there were entrusted to his own care $50,000 of money belonging to the literary fund, which had been put under the management of commissioners who had appointed him treasurer of the fund; so that the whole amount of the defalcation was $182,538. Of this sum, it appeared he had vested in real estate, or otherwise, about $90,000; what he did with the rest has never been explained, and is still a mystery. His malversation commenced no doubt many years before the detection of it; but it was unimportant, in the suit against his sureties, which was brought by the Commonwealth, to ascertain when or how it commenced, or the history of its progress; and, therefore, I can give you no information as to this particular. A judgment was recovered against his sureties, in his official bond, for the amount of the deficit in the Treasury of the Commonwealth, exclusive of the amount of the deficit in the literary fund, (which, in fact, was not discovered till afterwards,) and his own property was sold to make good the deficit; but the proceeds of his own effects fell short of the amount, and a large balance was paid by his sureties.

During the whole time of the continuance of Gen. Preston in office, the state of the treasury was every year examined by a committee of the Legislature, and reported to be in all respects fair and regular. The absence of all suspicion produced a want of care in making these yearly examinations, which enabled the treasurer somehow or other to conceal his malversations.

So much for the case of General Preston. His successor, Jerman Baker, was, at the time he was first appointed to the office, about forty-four years of age. He, too, like his predecessor, was a man of the fairest character; but he was not, like him, in easy circumstances; on the contrary, he was much embarrassed by debt. He continued in office till the 28th March, 1828, when he died by his own hand. An examination of the state of the Treasury by a committee of the Executive council had been appointed to be made on the 1st April; he knew from a communication made to him by one of the committee that the examination must lead to a detection of his embezzlement, and he anticipated the disgrace by suicide. The total amount of his embezzlement was little over $33,000. The exact manner in which he committed the embezzlements was distinctly ascertained, as well as the manner in which he had contrived to conceal them from the investigating committee of the Legislature and of the Executive council; and this appeared so simple, so open to view, that it was wonderful how it could have failed to attract attention; but the same unbounded confidence was reposed in him as in all his predecessors; and no man imagining the possibility of embezzlement, se no man took the least pains to detect one.

Now if our confidence should be asked in the officers to be appointed under this act, on account of the high source from which they are to derive the appointment, I answer that it is not higher than in the unfortunate cases last referred to. Those officers were appointed by the Legislature of Virginia; and I would say further, what no man can dispute, that the means of information possessed by that Legislature were far better than the Executive of the United States can ever have. They probably knew the men, many of them personally, which can rarely happen to the President. Their selection shows that they were well qualified to make it, for they appointed men of the very first character in the State. It must not be forgotten in addition to all these considerations, that the President of the United States has not the whole Union to select from; he makes his appointments from his party. Neither are examinations to be relied upon; they were periodically made in Virginia by committees appointed for the purpose, and were far more substantial in all respects than the colorable examinations directed by this bill. Yet they proved unavailing; and, still further, the character of any officer who may be appointed under this bill can never offer a higher pledge, or be a better security, than was afforded by General Preston or Mr. Baker.

These instances have made a deep and permanent impression in Virginia; it is not to be wondered at that Virginia is opposed to the Sub-Treasury. I call upon the Representatives of that State to speak her sentiments here. I am contending, not for triumph, but for truth, and will not believe it to be in vain. In that same State there is a still more recent case, occurring in one of her banks, and marked by the circumstance that the delinquent was a man of high character, and enjoying unbounded confidence. Yet he too proved himself unworthy of the great confidence reposed in him. And here I would remark that this question of personal confidence is precisely the same, whether it occur in banks or elsewhere. It is personal confidence that is to be reposed by this bill, of the same kind, exposed to the same temptations, and involving the same risks as the instances which have now been detailed. I appeal, then, to every member of this committee, whether it is wise, or consistent with just morality, to create such temptations, and to incur such risks. I appeal especially, as I said before, to the members from Virginia, because they know full well the pain, and suffering, and loss of character inflicted by the delinquency of the individuals who have been named.

The evidence does not stop here; it goes much further, and to my mind is quite conclusive. When the security for personal confidence has been betrayed or failed, and thus proved insufficient, what has been at last resorted to; not in one State, but universally? The very reverse of that which this bill proposes. The use of individual depositaries, and the reliance upon personal confidence, have been abandoned, condemned as unfit to be trusted to; and the very opposite method employed.

This bill, by a singular contradiction to the universal decision founded upon experience, goes back to that which, having been tried and found wanting, has been condemned and abandoned. What was done by Congress with regard to those sub-treasurers of courts, with whom the money of suitors has been deposited, as in the instance of Theron Rudd, in New York? By an act of the 3d of March, 1817, it was enacted and provided that they should no longer be trusted. When that subject was under discussion, I recollect that we, who are from Pennsylvania, were gratified to find that an adequate provision had early been made in the courts of that district, affording perfect security, and furnishing a model for the legislation of Congress. The learned judge of that court, the late Judge Peters, had been in the public civil service during the war of the Revolution, was the associate of the men who organized our Government under the Constitution, and was well acquainted, no doubt, with the arrangement of the Treasury. What did he do? By a rule of that court, no money was left in the hands of the clerk, (though a man as worthy of confidence as any man,) nor subject to his power. It was ordered to be placed in bank, to the credit of the court, in the cause on account of which it was paid in, and could only be paid out upon the order of the court, certified by the clerk, under the court's seal. This was a perfect check, and not a dollar was ever lost in that district. The same plan precisely is adopted in the act of the 3d of March, 1817, as the law of all our courts. It is still the law; it has been found, as far as I know, to be effectual. No loss has since been sustained; but what is more material this law is a legislative declaration by Congress that personal responsibility is not to be relied on, as experience had shown. If it be true, as the existence of this act affirms, that the comparatively small amounts lodged in the courts of the United States cannot be safely entrusted to individual depositaries, how is it possible that any man in his right mind can affirm that the whole treasure of the United States may be so entrusted?

What was done in Virginia? The case of Baker induced the Legislature to make a new organization of the Treasury Department. Before that time, the law required all public money to be paid directly to the Treasurer; and though he was required to deposite such portions of it as he should think not necessary to be kept in the Treasury office, in the two banks of Virginia at Richmond, yet he deposited in the banks, and kept in the office only such portions of the public money as he deemed convenient, and payments to the public creditors were made by him, either out of the moneys kept in the Treasury office, or by checks on the banks, as he thought proper. The accounts kept by the banks were accounts between them and the Treasurer; they were accountable to him alone, and he alone accountable to the Commonwealth. All accounts of moneys due to or from the Commonwealth were settled in the Auditor's office, and moneys were received into the Treasury, or paid out of it, upon warrants of the Auditor, whose books were thus a check upon the accounts of the Treasurer, but not upon his disposition of the public money.

The new organization made in consequence of Baker's case is such that, in truth, not one dollar of public money is ever entrusted to the safekeeping of the treasurer. That officer is a mere clerk to keep the cash accounts of the public treasury. The scheme is simply this: every collector of public money, every person indebted to the public on any account, presents his account to the First or the Second Auditor, according to the character of the fund to which the money belongs. The auditor, having ascertained the amount justly due, gives an order on the treasurer to receive the money from the debtor; upon which the treasurer endorses an order, that the debtor shall pay it into one of the banks at Richmond. The debtor brings the treasurer a receipt for it from the bank; the treasurer then gives him a receipt for it, which he carries to the auditor, who, thereupon, gives him an acquittance; and when money is paid from the treasury, the auditor settles the claim, and gives the public creditor an order on the treasurer for the amount due; upon which the treasurer endorses a check on one of the banks, and takes a receipt from the creditor for the amount. No money can be paid into the treasury, or out of it, in any other way.

These arrangements have proved efficient. I call again upon the members of this House, and especially upon the members from Virginia, to say why they will depart from it to return to a plan already tried until its utter failure was proved? Why will they not listen to the voice of the Congress of the United States deliberately addressed to them? Why will they not listen to the voice of Virginia, speaking to them so emphatically? But, powerful as it is, we have not yet done with the evidence. What do we all do? What do individuals do for the safekeeping of their money? Here and there one may be found who, perhaps, from some humor, (commonly deemed a very foolish one,) or some weak fear, keeps his treasure in his house. The next thing you hear is of a robbery—perhaps a murder—and then we all exclaim, what a fool he was thus to invite the robber to his dwelling!

What do associated bodies do, chartered or not chartered? Where do they place their money for safekeeping? What do public bodies do, towns, counties, States? They all resort to banks. What do we ourselves do? The moneys drawn for the uses of this House are placed in bank. If the United States adopt a different plan, they will stand alone; and they will stand upon a foundation which the concurrent voice and experience of the whole United States have declared to be insecure and insufficient. This is a strange anomaly in a popular Government, a representative Government springing from the people, and one would suppose imbued with the principles, the opinions, and the usages of the people. But these, it seems, are all to be rejected, and the Government of the United States to be separated and distinguished in its very nature from the people, as if it were a monarchy or a despotism, and had an independent character and existence of its own.

I will not take up the time of the committee with insisting upon the risk of robbery from without, yet it is certainly worthy of some consideration. In former times, when the treasure of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania was kept in the Treasury building in the city of Philadelphia, it is well known attempts were made to rob the house by night. A bank in the city of Philadelphia has twice been robbed of large amounts, once from without, and once without any signs of external force. A receiver of the moneys of the United States in the West was some years ago robbed of a large sum under circumstances which attracted a great deal of attention. Whenever the same inducement is offered, as it will be by this bill, you may look for the same results; and no one can assure you that you may not look for pretended robberies, too, to cover real delinquencies. But enough has been said to establish beyond contradiction that, in the essential point of safety, this plan is utterly deficient.

We have been called upon for our plan. Our offering or not offering a plan cannot make our objections either stronger or weaker. Our objection is, that this bill is essentially weak and objectionable; but why should we offer a plan? We are but a minority in this House, and in the other House, and the Executive is against us. With what hope of carrying it, could we propose any thing? I would readily state my own views, if there were time and occasion, although there is no necessity for so doing. They would be very simple. I would only remind this House that what has been may be. If they wish to know what plan is, in all respects, best adapted to the service of the country, they have only to inquire what plan was in operation when the condition of the country was most prosperous and happy. They will not find it to be the Sub-Treasury, either as it has actually existed for three years past, or as it is proposed to be perpetuated by this bill. This hint is sufficient for the present purpose.

But why talk about a plan? We have alread seen that, in the establishment of a Treasury, three points are to be regarded—"safety, economy, and public convenience." For safety and economy in keeping, banks are amply sufficient—good State banks! Who doubts it? Their capital is ample security for whatever may be deposited in them, and until that whole capital is exhausted, the creditor can be in no danger. Money placed with them is protected by arrangements which they find necessary for their own security. Confidence, in some degree, is necessary even in a bank, but in a well ordered bank the system of checks is provided to make it as small as possible. It is only where these guards are neglected, and too much confidence reposed in individuals, that they suffer losses. But be this as it may, their loss is no loss to the depositor, or to the creditor. The bank is bound to pay him.

The security of the public treasure deposited in banks rests mainly on this, that it enables you so to arrange your checks as that spoliation of the public funds cannot happen.

Gen. Harrison saw this at once, with that intuitive and comprehensive sagacity which so strikingly characterized him. Banks were used from the beginning. When, some time ago, in another debate, the act of 1789 was quoted to show that coin was employed in the receipt and disbursement of the revenue, the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] produced an early Treasury order, directing the collectors to receive bank paper, or to convert their money into such paper, and not to remit coin. The same venerable gentleman accompanied it with a remark—a perfectly just and obvious one—that to withdraw a given amount of coin from a place of trade was not merely to deprive them of so much money, but of all the credit it would nourish. This plan was known to Congress, and approved by Congress, at a very early period, not later than the year 1794. In that year, Mr. Baldwin, member of Congress of Georgia, in this House, as chairman of a committee appointed for the purpose, made a report upon "the condition of the Treasury." Any one desirous of becoming acquainted with all the details of the Treasury arrangements, which, let it be remarked, continued in full operation to this very day, without any change whatever, will find them in that report, printed in the American State Papers—title, Finance, vol. 1, p. 281. The paragraph most material to the present inquiry is in page 283, under the head of "second, as to keeping." It is there stated, with obvious satisfaction, in the first place, that the public moneys are kept in the several banks; and, in the next place, that neither the Treasurer nor any other officer of the Government ever has in his possession, custody, or control, any of the money or other things of value belonging to the United States; they are deposited in bank. To be sure, if any individual could have drawn upon the bank, he would have had as much control, and as dangerous control over the money as if it had been in his possession; and, accordingly, it has happened that defalcations have occurred where such control was allowed to individuals. It is the same thing as giving them the custody of the public money. But then the difference is this, and an important difference it is, that if the money is in the hands of an individual, you can establish no check will prevent him from embezzling or using it. If the money be in bank, you can easily establish checks which have never failed; such are the checks established in the organization of the Treasury Department by Alexander Hamilton, under which not a dollar has ever been embezzled or lost; such are the checks established by the act of 3d of March, 1817, which have proved efficacious; such are the checks established in the final arrangement of the Virginia Treasury, which have never failed; and such are the checks which every well constituted and well ordered moneyed institution in the United States establishes for itself, and finds to be effectual as long as they are maintained. It is only where undue confidence in individuals causes these guards to be neglected, that we find instances of defalcation or embezzlement. When the treasure of the United States is deposited in State banks, or in any banks, these checks can be applied to it; it is therefore safe. The money is kept without charge, and therefore the keeping is economical; but if the money be left in the hands of the individual, you can neither place guards over it nor have it kept without paying for it.

In point of expense and safety, therefore, there is no manner of comparison between State banks and individual depositaries. The former are infinitely preferable. No man of common sense and common prudence would hesitate between them in his own affairs.

The risk from loss from the failure of banks employed as depositaries, is absolutely nothing. From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 12th of December, 1834, it appears that all the losses from this cause, from the establishment of the Government to the present day, are so small as not to be worth estimating or considering. That the whole loss (including that by bank paper) is not equal, as he says, "to the sums frequently lost by the failure of many single disbursing agents connected with different departments of the Government, and under bond, they will not exceed what is due from two mercantile firms." This, it will be perceived, is a positive statement of a fact, which is, of course, to be taken to be true; and there is no doubt of its truth. There is no doubt either of the truth of the deduction which the Secretary of the Treasury makes from it. In the same report there is a plain assertion of the infinite superiority of banks over individual depositaries. Accordingly, upon that evidence, thus furnished by the Secretary, such has been the universal conclusion. In the Doc. No. 10, of the present session, there is a table contained, (No. 3,) which seems to present a different view. I say seems. It cannot be supposed that the Secretary of the Treasury meant flatly to contradict himself as to a plain matter of fabt. He had no other or better knowledge in 1837 than he had in December, 1834. He does not pretend to have had any thing before him which ought to change his statement. To suppose that under these circumstances he has flatly contradicted himself, would be to discredit him altogether. He would not be entitled to be believed in either statement. The rule of law, and the rule of common sense, is to endeavor to reconcile evidence, rather than produce a conflict in it, and especially when it is the evidence of the same witness, who must otherwise be made to contradict himself, and destroy his own character for veracity. If these two statements be different in point of fact, one of them must inevitably be untrue. But, upon examination, it will be found that they can be reconciled; penetrating beyond the surface of No. 3, which is certainly so contrived, whether by design or accident it is not for me to say, as to seem to contradict the former one. The difference between these two statements is this: the first of them, that in Decemner, 1834, asserts a fact; the latter presents an estimate. The estimate as no reference whatever to the fact, but is founded upon considerations entirely unconnected with it. Still it must be admitted that these two statements have been made out—the very face of them shows it—with contradictory views. The first was designed to maintain that the State banks are secure and safe—the last is designed to disparage all banks. And this contradiction of purpose has led to the seeming contradiction between them, whether designed or not.

But, with a little attention, we can reconcile the Secretary with himself; and in charity we must do so. In the table No. 3, there is a column with the heading, "Losses by deposite banks." There is another column, headed "Losses on notes received." In the first column, from 1789 to 1816, inclusive, the statement is, "None appearing on the books." Why these qualifying words, "appearing on the books," are introduced, it is difficult to say, unless it is meant to suggest to the reader that there may be losses which do not appear, and thus to raise a doubt in his mind. The common rule is, "De non apparentibus, et non existentibus, eadem est ratio"—a maxim very familiar to the Secretary, and especially applicable here; because, if a loss did exist, it must have appeared. Throughout the remaining period, under this same head, some losses are stated, but of so small an amount as not to impair the truth of what the Secretary stated in December, 1834. So far, then, there is no contradiction. In the second column, "Losses on notes received," he has the following statement for the four years beginning in 1813, and ending in 1816, to wit: "Estimated in these four years by the Treasury Department at $5,500,000." "Estimated by committee of House of Representatives at $34,000,000" The grounds of this estimate, or the principles on which it is made, are not exhibited; we only discern that they are the same as those upon which the committee of the House of Representatives proceeded. What these are we are informed by an extract from a report of that committee, accompanying this table, and sent by the Secretary to this House, no doubt for the purpose of explanation. Let us see what it is.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. McDuffie,] who had made that report, was arguing in favor of a National Bank, and in favor of the renewal of the charter of the existing Bank. His object in the part extracted was to show what the Government had lost, during the period just referred to, by not having a National Bank—not that it had lost by employing the State banks. No such thing. The whole argument was consistent and clear, and very able. But the Secretary of the Treasury argues, not as the distinguished gentleman at the head of that committee did, but, if he argues at all, argues against all banks. This is a total perversion of the reasoning of the committee, and contrary to the very design of it. It applies to a point which was not in the view of the committee. It may perhaps be skilful, but it is extremely unfair. Mr. McDuffie never said in that report that there had been losses by State banks. He said there had been losses by not having a National Bank; which was true then and is true now. The process by which he reached his conclusion is this: During the short period of the war he says you sold $80,000,000 of debt at an average discount of 15 per cent. There was a loss, therefore, of $12,000,000, "which would in all probability have been saved if the Treasury had been aided by such an institution as the Bank of the United States" The plain and obvious meaning of this is, if you had had a Bank of the United States, your credit would been maintained; you would have sold stock at a higher price; therefore, you would have saved the loss of the $12,000,000, or a part of it. But he says further: "The $68,000,000 received by the Government for its stock was in bank paper, which, compared with specie, was depreciated." This is as plain as what goes before. The credit of the banks was better than the credit of the Government, but bank paper was not as good as specie. The Government was obliged to go to market with its stock, in undue quantities, during the pressure of the war, in order to get the means of carrying it on, and they had to take in exchange for it what people were willing to give. If they had required specie, and been able to obtain it at all, they could only have obtained as much as was equal to the amount of bank paper received, less the difference. "But," says Mr. McDuffie, "if you had had a Bank of the United States, your stock would have sold better, because your credit would have been maintained."

All this is very clear and intelligible; but the Secretary, in his estimate, calls this a total loss, estimated by the committee, and his own reduced estimate, a loss on notes received. Every man who is able to understand this subject perceives that the loss was upon the stock sold, because the Government could not, in exchange for it, get a greater amount in bank paper. Thus the whole is reconciled and explained, and the assertion of the Secretary of the Treasury, in his report of 1834, stands unimpeached. By the two banks of the United States, employed as depositories, and credited by receiving their bills, not a dollar was ever lost in the whole period of their existence, which was forty years. By the State banks, in the whole period of our Government, from 1789 to the present time, the loss has been so small as not to be worth computing.

The position, then, is clear and impregnable, that, for safety and economy in keeping, banks are unexceptionable—individual depositaries, as clearly, are not. Banks, then, are unquestionably preferable. Individual depositaries ought never to be resorted to, and never are resorted to, but in case of absolute necessity. Whenever they are resorted to, from necessity or otherwise, loss is sure to follow.

Certain other things, besides safety and economy in keeping, are requisite to a complete system which, it may be admitted, neither State banks nor individual depositaries can adequately supply. The fiscal convenience and regularity of the Government, the maintenance of a uniform currency in sufficient quantity, the adaptation of the fiscal concerns of the nation to the business and circulation of the country, so as to assist and regulate them; all these are things which are desirable, and which may be attained. Supposing that State banks and individual depositaries are equally incompetent in this respect, still the banks would have the superiority in point of safety and economy. Their preference would be a plain dictate of prudence. In reality, however, even State banks can do much more than individual depositaries can towards the accomplishment of these purposes. They can only be effectually and thoroughly accomplished by means of a National Bank. You never have had, and you never can have, a perfect system without it. With it you have had, and you know that you can have, a system as perfect and as conducive to the welfare of the people as the nature of things will allow. It worked better than any system in the known world. It answered fully all the purposes of the Treasury; it conformed to the habits and wishes of the people; and it went hand in hand with their prosperity. Without it you have had nothing but disorder, and you never will have. The present question, however, is not about a Bank of the United States: it is between banks and individuals; and I trust enough has been said to show that individual depositaries are unsafe and extravagant. On this point there seems to be universal consent throughout the United States.

I owe some apology to the committee for going into so much detail under this head. It is tedious, undoubtedly; but I trust they will be satisfied that the evidence thus exhibited to them—bearing as it does directly upon the practical operation of this project—is more instructive than any general statements would be, and far more satisfactory than the more general views in which the subject might be considered.

A Sub-Treasurer will have no difficulty whatever in carrying off the public treasure; he has only to roll the chest to a steamer that may be ready to depart, and he and the money are immediately beyond the reach of the Government; or, if he has been previously delinquent, he may carry himself off in the same way, without any risk of being overtaken.

We now proceed to the remaining point to be considered, namely, the CONVENIENCE of the plan.

We have already, as has been before remarked, had it in operation for three years. There is nothing in the effects it has produced during that time to recommend it for continuance. On the floor of this House it was declared three years ago, by the then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that it was in operation; and, "in spite of lamentations here or elsewhere," would be in operation until the 4th of March, 1841. The meaning of this declaration was, that it would not be repealed during the term of the present President—he would veto a repeal. Whether he meant this as an intimation that no relief was to be had but by a change of the head of the Administration, I will not undertake to say, but assuredly the people have taken it as a hint to that effect, and are now, with unexampled zeal and unanimity, preparing to cut up the evil at the root by means of the ballot-box. A change they have resolved upon; and who can wonder at it after what they have suffered and what they have been told? The bill means one of two things: either to establish a different and better currency for the Government than that used by the people, or to force into use a hard money currency for all the concerns of the country.

It proposes, finally, by one or both of these means, to break up and destroy the banking or credit system. My position, on this subject, is a very plain, and, as it appears to me, a very safe one. It is this: that it is cheapest and most convenient for the people to pay their public dues in their accustomed currency. If that be convertible paper, their adoption of it proves that it is as good, or better than specie. It is better suited to their business, else they would not adopt it. Why should they not pay in it? What is asked, and what ought to be expected from them by the Government, is a contribution from what they have. It is the toll to the miller—a part of the produce sent to him to be manufactured, taken from the mass. So it should be with the Government. There is no more reason or convenience in requiring of the citizen to buy for them something out of his usual way of dealing, than for the miller to demand that his toll should be paid in superior grain. The only example to the contrary, that I know of, is that of China, already mentioned. The nature of our Government demands that this system should be adhered to. A departure from it tends to change the character of the Government. It makes the distinction in favor of the Government elevating them in this respect above the people, as if that which the people find good enough for themselves were not good enough for the Government. It destroys the sympathy of the Government for the people, by removing from the Government all feeling of the afflictions which, by their pressure weigh down the people—they are not felt by the Treasury. By this scheme of a separate circulation, there is a separate pulsation, so that the disease which visits the people is not felt at the Treasury, nor in the Treasury circulation. Nay, more than this: that the very circumstances which oppress, disastrously oppress, the business of the country in all its branches, may, as they now actually do, turn to the advantage of the office holders. Thus, there is not only a want of sympathy, but an actual and unceasing conflict between their concerns; when every man must admit that they ought to be identical, so that at the Treasury, and in the Government, there should be a quick and lively sensibility to whatever injuriously affects the people. Without this, we must always experience what we have experienced for the last three years, a careless indifference in the Government to the distresses of the people, and a cold-hearted neglect of the means of giving relief.

The officers of the Government in fact cease to be a part of the people, and acquire interests of their own, directly opposed to the common interests. The family compact is thus perverted, and an approximation made to Governments of an entirely different character. The practice of such Governments proves nothing. Still, what has been assumed in regard to them is not true. In the island of Cuba, for example, any one who will look into Hazzard's Register, at page 414, will find that the currency and circulation are in a condition of extreme disorder. Worn and depreciated coin of inconvenient denominations, such as pistareens, are forced in payment, at prices far beyond their real value—doubloons have difierent values. The whole thing is unjust, inconvenient, and oppressive in its operation. The remedy the people have sought for is a bank; but this, the metropolitan Government in Spain refuses to allow them; or, which is equivalent, will grant it only upon terms too onerous to be accepted. I do not doubt that, if we had time to go into an examination of the other evidence, we should find the history elsewhere to be the same.

This bill destroys, by one of its enactments, the only remaining connection of the Treasury with banks, and the only remnant of wholesome control it has over them. The resolution of the 30th of April, 1816, makes the notes of specie paying banks receivable in the payment of public dues. This, it may be admitted, is an insufficient check, not to be compared to that which would be afforded by a Bank of the United States; but still it is a check. The Government, by means of it, has the power to discredit banks that fail to pay specie, and so to aid the people in keeping the banks up to their duty. But this act repeals that resolution, and prohibits the receipt of bank notes entirely, good or bad. Thus it discredits all banks, instead of discrediting only those who have not done what they ought to do to sustain their credit. In this the Government does more than neglect its duty, which is to regulate, and support, and provide for the currency. Its power is here exercised to the contrary. It destroys, as far as it is able, the distinction between good and bad banks, and places them all upon a level, when it is obviously the interest of the people that the distinction should be maintained by all the exertions of both Government and people. Still worse, there is a perpetual conflict produced, injurious to the banks, by keeping up a continual, and at the same time, an uncertain demand upon them for their specie, so that they never can know what they may be called on for.

The Treasury avoids the obnoxious responsibility of drawing specie from the banks, but it compels the people to make the drafts on the banks, being thus itself the secret cause of the mischief, but putting the odium upon individuals. Why this war upon the banks? They are State institutions, authorized and established by the Legislatures of the States, and having every constitutional sanction. They are within the States, under the protection of the States, and beyond the reach of any direct power of the National Government. The exercise of such a power is as plainly denied as if it were expressly prohibited in the Constitution. Is it right, then? Is it consistent with the true meaning of the Constitution of the United States? Is it not a most wanton and unauthorized abuse of the powers granted, to employ them indirectly for the accomplishment of purposes which cannot be constitutionally accomplished? Why may not the Federal Government abuse all its powers in the same way, and make war upon every State right and State interest? The right of the States to have banks, and the right of the people to use bank credit in their business, their right so to employ their capital is just as clear and perfect a right as the right to cultivate the earth and to raise from it such products as are deemed most advantageous. Why may not the Government of the United States, then, with equal justice, make war upon any other employment of capital or industry? Why not employ their powers to stop the cultivation of cotton or tobacco? or the manufacture of cotton or wool? This would be a daring invasion of the rights of the States and the people; but so is the war upon the banks. The duty of the Government is to protect and to regulate them. It has the power to do so. The neglect to exercise it by the Government is the real cause of th ir warfare upon the banks.

Banks are essentially republican institutions. They have grown up every where with the growth of commerce and the advance of free principles. In these United States they have been co-existent with our independence and freedom; and besides the merit of this association, it cannot be denied by any one acquainted with our history that they contributed powerfully to secure them. In our colonial state we had no banks. All the colonies, finding credit of some sort necessary, prayed for the issue of paper money; it was grudgingly and scantily and tardily allowed to them; as if the metropolitan Government had an instinctive feeling that the use of credit would invigorate the growth of industry, and hasten the period when this great country would claim to shake off colonial subjection. It could not be entirely denied, and, for want of something better, all the colonies had recourse to the issue of bills of credit. They are liable to great and serious objections, as all Government paper is. There is an unrestrained tendency to excess, in the use of Government paper, which never fails to cause its depreciation, and often its entire destruction. Such was the case with our continental money. After gradually exhausting the public confidence, it finally failed in the year 1779 or 1780. In the midst of the war the Government was left without money or credit. At this critical moment, a few patriotic citizens, from their own means, established the Bank of North America in the city of Philadelphia—the same which, soon after, was incorporated by an ordinance of Congress.

Credit revived. By the agency of this institution funds were obtained, which the credit of the Government could not command, for the decisive military movement which terminated the war at Yorktown. I have said that they are essentially republican institutions. I may add, they are, in that respect, precisely adapted to our condition and to the support of republican equality. We have few overgrown fortunes. We have few who are in the opposite extreme of abject poverty. We have not, happily, the contrast which is exhibited elsewhere. The secret of our happiness consists mainly in this.

We have, at the same time, full employment for capital, and it is furnished by means of banks. It is a rare thing to find an individual among us who is able to establish a bank of his own. The late Stephen Girard was rich enough to employ a million and a half of capital in that way; which, at the time of his death, had increased by the profits to four millions of dollars.

Suppose there had been fifteen hundred people who could contribute one thousand dollars each to the like purpose; or fifteen thousand who could contribute one hundred dollars each, why would you withhold from them the privilege of employing their capital by union in the same manner as their richer neighbor? Would you give the advantage in this respect to the rich? Surely not. The capital of the country, in small portions, is distributed among a great many individuals, in whose hands it would be idle and inactive, producing nothing to themselves or to others. By combining their means in a bank, they make it profitable for themselves and for the community. Their charter gives them nothing but the privilege of thus uniting. It confers upon them no benefit which each individual does not enjoy. They can have a common seal. They can sue and be sued; and are subjected to such restrictions as the State Legislatures may think fit. No monopoly is granted to them. On the contrary, they are permitted to associate in order to counteract the monopoly of wealth.

The history of banks shows that, under ordinary circumstances, this is their operation. They are often denounced in thoughtless and violent declamation as aristocratic institutions. Those who make such charges have not examined into the matter. They are essentially Democratic institutions. Of fourteen banks in the city and county of Philadelphia, it appears from an investigation made a few years ago, that the total capital was $14,305,000. The number of stockholders was, at the same time, 7,112; the average amount of each stockholder was therefore $2,010—scarcely as much as the pay of a member of this House for a long session, and nothing like the amount of pay and mileage. Are these stockholders members of the aristocracy? In the Kensington Bank the capital was $250,000, the shareholders were 253; the average proprietorship was therefore less than $1,000. Were these stockholders members of the aristocracy? Are they a description of persons to cause us such fearful alarm, and to deserve such vehement denunciations? The smallest proprietorship in the Bank of England, according to my recollection, is £500 sterling, or $2,500. The stock in our banks is seldom higher than $100 a share, and in most of them as low as $50. A small accumulation serves to buy one. If these bank proprietors be not formidable for their wealth—and, surely, no sane man will pretend that they are—still less are they to be dreaded for their character. In the same investigation, it was found that, in the Philadelphia Bank, full one-third of the stock was held by the most helpless portions of society—by widows and children, trustees, executors, and benevolent societies. No doubt the proportion would be found the same in the other banks, and in some of them even greater. Such people are not to be feared. They do not deserve to be denounced. They ought to be supported and protected. It is inhuman to make war upon them. Their little portion is the representative of their own, or their parents' industry, or the little purse collected for objects of charity, and has a just claim to our most sacred regard. Such is the aristocracy of the capital of these State banks. Is its employment aristocratic? The money thus accumulated is lent to the industrious and enterprising to help them in their lawful pursuits, and to encourage exertion for placing themselves in a state of independent comfort. Whatever it may be the fashion in these days to say of credit, Dr. Franklin, who had passed through every grade in life, from a humble printer's boy to the highest elevation, knew full well the value of credit to an industrious young man. He knew its value to a community. Besides insisting upon it in his writings, he remembered it emphatically in his will. He left two legacies: one to the city of Philadelphia, and the other to the city of Boston, of money to be lent out to young mechanics. This act has always been regarded as a proof of his wisdom and benevolence. Is this an aristocratic employment of money? Is it a thing to be denounced and declaimed against, and menaced with destruction?

But, of the present measure, the object and the effect are plainly to raise the value of money by diminishing its quantity and at the same time increasing its cost, by substituting an expensive currency for one that is cheap. This, too, is to be achieved very rapidly, suddenly—I may say, at once.

All who have thought upon this subject have concurred in opinion that the gradual increase of the quantity, even with the diminution of value, is favorable to industry, to prosperity, and to human happiness. From the first working of the mines on this continent till quite lately, this operation was going on, until at length, by the increased quantity of gold and silver used in coin, its value was reduced, as computed, to about one-fourth. This embraces the period in the history of the world when its improvement has been the greatest and the steadiest. There is not time to go into a detailed examination; but those who desire to see how much better the condition of man is, how his comforts have been increased, his health promoted, and even the probabilities of life enlarged by several years, may find many of the particulars in Mr. McCulloch's statistics of the British empire. All have agreed that the diminution of quantity, and consequent enhancement of the value of money, is injurious. The present is an inauspicious moment for insisting on an increased use of gold and silver; for, owing to the disturbances in the States south of us, or to the falling off of the productiveness of the American mines, there has been a great diminution in the world of the quantity above ground. Mr. Jacob, in his work upon this subject, compiled with great care, estimates that the diminution in the period of twenty years, from 1809 to 1829, is £66,000,000 sterling, being about one-sixth of the whole quantity. If it has gone on at the same rate for the last ten years, you may add £33,000,000 sterling, which will make it one-fourth. What is our proportion in this diminished state of the gold and silver of the world?

Leaving these general views, however, let us come to those which are more strictly our own. The diminished quantity and the increased value of money operate upon property, upon wages, or the price of labor, and upon debts, but in very different and even opposite ways. It lowers property, it reduces wages, and it increases debts. An estate which may have been adequate to pay all the charges upon it, and leave something for the owner, is unable to discharge its incumbrances; the owner has nothing left, and he is ruined. It is no fault of his; he had no reason to expect, no prudence required him to foresee, such a reverse. Reverses he might knew he was exposed to, from various causes, and if they came he must submit to them. But it could never enter his mind that he was going to be ruined by an act of the Government. He would look to that quarter rather for aid than for destruction. Sudden changes in the currency, of this sort, by the disorder and obstruction they introduce into all classes of industry, deprive the poor man of employment, or, if he is able to get it, compel him to work for less. But the office holder, the creditor, and the moneyed capitalist are benefited; the nominal amount they receive is the same, but the denomination represents a greater value—it may be double. What is gained by the office holder, the creditor, and by the capitalist, is lost to the producer, to the owner of property, to the debtor, and to the laborer; they are all sacrificed in the crisis of caprice and experiment. Now let us look, in the first place, at the condition of our country. It is a very large debtor. The States of this Union owe at least two hundred millions of dollars, a great part of it abroad. The annual interest may be computed, I suppose, including the charges, at twelve millions of dollars. The debts owing among ourselves cannot be estimated with any precision, nor the debts owing by individuals abroad. The debt at home is unequally divided among different sections of the country; a large portion of it rests upon the South, and especially the Southwestern States. The latter are very heavily encumbered, at the same time that their chief staple has fallen below what any one could have anticipated. It is probable there is a large debt in the West also, from the inordinate sales of lands in 1836 and 1836.

There is also a universal crush and stagnation. There is with it an unprecedented want of confidence. Property seems to have lost its value; credit is destroyed; and labor is without employment. They all stand in need of encouragement and assistance. Is it wise, expedient, or just, under these circumstances, to do any thing which will increase the distress—which will co-operate with the destruction now going on, and aggravate the public calamity? Is it consistent with common humanity to do further injury to the owner of property, the debtor, and the laborer? Ought we, above all, to throw in this new and powerful ingredient of injustice and wrong, by raising the value of money? A parental Government would see and feel that this duty was in a contrary direction. One would suppose that the performance of such a duty would, at all times, be acceptable and pleasing. Still, if it were beyond the power of Government to give any aid, (which I do not admit,) it is unnatural and cruel in the Government, by its measures, to place its foot upon the crushed interests of the country, as if it were determined to sink them still lower, and to keep them down. A change is necessary. No one doubts it. But of all the changes that could be wrought, this Sub-Treasury is most to be deprecated. It has no healing in it for the disorder of the times. It is poisonous, and so has proved itself for the last three years.

But we are continually told there has been overtrading, overissue, and the like. What then? The calamity is upon us, and our duty is to endeavor to alleviate it. Ought we to seek to aggravate it? Why, especially, when there has been a general excess, are we to point our whole indignation against the banks, even if they had shared in the delusion which affected every branch of business? In a report at the extra session, the Secretary undertook to instruct us as to the causes of our embarrassments. The first he mentioned was the over production of cotton, and the consequent fall of price, equal to twenty millions of dollars. Why not, then, check the production of cotton, restrict its culture, or take it into the hands of the Government? Examples may be found of such things. The poor Ryots, in British India, are compelled to cultivate the opium plant, at a price fixed by the Government, (so low as scarcely to afford a substance,) and to furnish the product to their task-masters, that they may make a profit of some millions by smuggling the poisonous drug into China. The Spanish Government kept in its hands a monopoly of tobacco in Mexico. The cultivator could only sell to the Government, at the price fixed by the Government, who alone manufactured the article, and, when manufactured, sold it at their own price. From this monopoly, according to Baron Humboldt, Spain drew an annual revenue of four millions of dollars a year. The Mexican Government, with a Constitution like our own (except that the President is only eligible for one term, in which the have the advantage of ours,) and Republican forms, continues the monopoly. If it be said that such restraints or interference on the part of Government are inconsistent with the freedom of the citizen, I admit the answer to just and sufficient. The fluctuations of trade are the effects of the spirit of enterprise, and, when that is left free to exert itself, they will occasionally occur. We had, at one period, over-speculation in merino sheep; we have lately had it in morus multicaulis—both appear to have been foolish errors, and much to be regretted. But does any one madly conclude from this, that the Government should be invested with power over the conduct of every individual in his own affairs?—to tell one man how much cotton he shall raise, and another how many sheep or trees he may buy, and at what prices? The spirit of enterprise belongs to free Governments, and is the offspring of freedom. Occasionally it may be too far indulged, and the consequences of it fall heavily on individuals; but, in the main, it is productive of good; and, at all events, is a part of our freedom. In its worst effects, it is only one of the smaller waves in the tempestuous sea of liberty, which we are told is to be preferred to the calm of despotism. This excess, however, by the confession of those who charge it, has extended to every branch of business. There has been excessive production of cotton; the Secretary tells us there has been excess of importation; the President tells us there have been excessive sales of public lands; and, in the midst of all these, we find it said there has been excess of expansion by the banks. Why is this branch of business exposed to peculiar censure, and, as it were, to the peculiar vengeance of the Government? The fault of the banks (if the fault had been in them) has been the common fault of us all, in which they only participated with the rest. They have but their proportion of error to answer for, and why should they be subjected to punishment for all? They are treated like the Jews, in a former period of the world, who were made responsible for every thing that was alleged to be wrong, and then exposed to confiscation, pillage, and death. They are persecuted like the poor unfortunate beings who, in times of superstition, were charged with being witches, and followed to their destruction with a senseless fury. The banks are now suffering in common with the country, whatever it may be owing to, and must submit to the corrective of the error, in common with others. More than this is unjust and injurious. It is especially hurtful to the other suffering interests of the country, because it cripples these institutions, and lessens their power of relief.

But now let us see truly how this matter really stands In 1830, only ten years ago, this country was in a state of solid prosperity. There was nothing in it that was speculative or treacherous; there was no hidden disease then lurking in the system. Our actual condition was what it appeared to be, and in all the elements of happiness it never was surpassed. At the end of the year 1830 (and this is a proof of what I have just said) we owed nothing or very little. We were out of debt. Our imports for the ten preceding years exceeded our exports but about three million five hundred thousand dollars a year, which is not more than was made up by a fair profit. The imports and exports of gold and silver during the same period were about equal, as nearly as can be ascertained. The annual average sales of public lands were about one million two hundred thousand dollars. It has been stated that in 1811 we had about fifteen millions of specie; some think it was not so much. In 1830 the specie in the country, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, was thirty millions, having been doubled in the twenty years. Of this, he says, twenty-six millions were in the banks. This specie, as you have seen, had been paid for by our exports, and was our own. These amounts were found ample for the use of the country. Not a bank, at either period, had suspended. Such, then, was the condition of the country in the year 1830. All this has been fearfully changed, and note the period when the change came over us. It was precisely when the Government undertook to interfere with the currency, and to change violently our whole money affairs. For the seven years which followed from 1831 to 1838, our imports exceeded our exports (making allowance for a reasonable profit) twenty-four millions of dollars a year. Of this excess one-third, that is, eight millions of dollars a year, was in gold and silver; we added, the Secretary boastingly said in one of his reports, fifty-five millions of dollars to our stock. Thus we had eighty-five millions of dollars in gold and silver, and in this state of things the banks suspended specie-payments. They were maintained when we had but thirty millions, and they were suspended when we had eighty-five millions. The annual average sales of the public lands for the seven years were $11,316,950, seven millions of which were paid for in specie, in the last half of the year 1836, after the specie circular had been issued. And now the whole country is in anguish. What does this specie cost us? Remember it is not our own. We have not paid for it. It is a debt we owe. It costs us not less than $3,850,000 a year, including interest and charges. Better had it never been brought in; better it were all sent back, the debt paid with it, and the country relieved from the burden of nearly $4,000,000 a year for specie which is of no manner of use to us. But the mischief does not end here—there is a further evil to be considered, of greater magnitude, and plainly chargeable upon the Government. When the deposites were removed from the Bank of the United States, the Government took upon itself to direct and manage the whole currency by means of the State banks. Having pledged themselves that, by these means, we should have a better currency, they undertook to manage the State banks in order, in their way, to redeem their pledge. Three things they clearly and constantly indicated as necessary to the success of their plan—an increase of bank capital, an extension of bank accommodation, and an increase of the quantity of gold and silver. They succeeded by their influence and management in all these points. It is the wisdom of the Government, if wisdom it may be called, which has produced them all. As they successively appeared, they were hailed by the officers of the Government as the evidences of their success. When they have all failed and exploded together, as the Government was admonished they would do, then, for the first time, the Government seeks to hide the final cause of our disasters, and to visit them upon their own instruments and victims. But at present we are speaking chiefly of the specie which the Government especially solicited to come among us; nothing was necessary for our happiness but plenty of gold and silver, plenty of banks and bank capital. We all remember the time when the silly promise was made that, in a few years, every substantial man should have a silk purse with "gold peeping through the interstices." How has this promise been kept? Ask a laboring man how it was with him in the year 1830. He will tell you he was fully employed. Ask him what he was paid in. He will say, probably, that he does not recollect, but he knows that it was money which enabled him to supply himself and his family with food and raiment and shelter, and a reasonable portion of comforts. How is it with him now? He is without employment, destitute, with neither gold nor silver, nor any other money which he can go to market with. And yet in 1830 we had but thirty millions of gold and silver; now we have eighty-five millions! No one can be at a loss to perceive how this gold and silver mania has wrought upon our affairs In 1830, the banks are said to have had twenty-six millions of specie. In 1836, as appears by the Secretary's report in December, 1837, they had forty-four millions, making an increase of eighteen millions. According to another report of the Secretary, they might safely operate on this specie to three times the amount. It made no difference to them whether the money was borrowed, or our own; whether we had paid for it, or were in debt and were paying interest. They knew nothing of all this. Its possession, by the theory of the Secretary, warranted, and no doubt caused, an expansion to the amount of at least fifty-four millions of dollars. Here, then, we were trading upon borrowed gold and silver, as already intimated, invited and coaxed into the country by the measures of the Government. To send specie away was a sort of treason, and denounced accordingly by the great financiers.

One instance I have heard mentioned, which particularly exemplifies this Government management. The banks of the city of New York were restricted by their charters, so that they could not discount more than fifty per cent. beyond their capital. By the Government deposites, some of them found themselves enabled to lend much more, and were desirous to be relieved from the restriction. They accordingly applied to the Legislature of New York. That body, instead of proceeding directly to grant or refuse their request, adopted a circuitous method, the reason of which it is not easy to understand. They authorized the banks to borrow money, and to discount to the amount so borrowed, and fifty per cent. more. Some of the banks negotiated loans in England under this authority, one would suppose merely to comply with the law, and not intending to bring the money from England, as they had already more than they could employ. Some time after, the Treasury signified to them, in the course of their management of the deposite banks, that they must increase their stock in specie. Such advice was, in effect, a command; it must be complied with, or the loss risked of the deposites. One bank, therefore, ordered, in part of its loans, two hundred thousand sovereigns in gold. They were accordingly shipped; they came directly from the Bank of England. An intelligent merchant, extensively engaged in business, became apprehensive that the bringing away of gold might cause alarm in England and injure the American credit there; he, therefore, purchased twenty thousand of these sovereigns, and sent them back to England. They returned, within six months, into the Bank of England in the very same packages, with the bank's mark upon them, in which they came out. This operation, without any advantage whatever, could not have cost the country less than five per cent. It was a dead loss without equivalent of any sort; and so is all the borrowed gold and silver which we have in the country. We have more specie now than we ever had before, and cannot pay specie. Who is benefited by it?

We were particularly anxious for gold; and the Executive was aided in his schemes for bringing it into the country by the gold bill, as well as by bank operations of a nature just mentioned. The Secretary of the Treasury, in one of his reports, tells us that we had increased our stock of gold fifteen millions of dollars. If you will examine the accounts of the Bank of England, you will find that, as the gold was coming to us, it was at the same time time leaving the bank. The Bank of England became alarmed, in the latter part of 1836, at the loss of its bullion, and began to inquire where it was going, in order to stop the drain. They discovered that it was flowing to the United States; in self-defence, which cannot be deemed unjustifiable, they discredited American bills, and this immediately produced the commercial convulsions we suffered in the early part of 1837.

American credit in England was destroyed—large amounts of bills were sent back; cotton fell; and the whole train of disasters followed, which we well remember, including the suspension of our banks.

In tracing these things back to their final cause, no one can fail to see in it the active hand of the Government. To its unhappy and preposterous influence we owe the whole mischief, the multiplication and expansion of banks included. The stimulating influence of Executive management was constantly applied, encouraging and exciting enterprise, and at the same time directing it by force into these channels. And we have not done with this ruinous interference yet. The specie must be kept, and the Sub-Treasury is to keep it at an expense, in interest and charges, of four millions of dollars a year! This would seem like infatuation, if it were not much worse. The real use of the Sub-Treasury is, that it has served the Government for a mask to cover its misdeeds. The attention of the country has been occupied by this preposterous project, instead of being turned to the investigation of Executive abuses—occupied in self defence against the odious measure. It is a coup d'etat, struck by the Administration, when all else had failed, to engage the thoughts of the people, and rally party upon, so that the eyes of our fellow-citizens might not be directed to the real causes of their distress. They will right themselves, notwithstanding, I firmly believe, by the constitutional method of changing the Executive. One cannot believe that they will longer submit to the ruinous effects of such foolery. For ten years all has gone wrong. The remedy is change. No change can be for the worse.

The history of the sales of the public lands is exactly the same. The excesses there, too, were encouraged and hailed by the Government. In 1835, they suddenly mounted up to the enormous sum of fourteen millions of dollars. In his annual message to Congress, in December, 1835, the President congratulated the country upon the fact that eleven millions had been received from this source, as an evidence "of the increasing prosperity of the country," and of the "advance of agriculture." The evidence went on increasing in the following year, and ought, one would suppose, to have produced further congratulation. But prosperity increased too fast, agriculture advanced too rapidly; and all at once, in the middle of the year 1836, instead of leaving these things to correct themselves, the Executive interfered to check them. The famous specie circular was issued to reduce the sales of lands. The measure was wholly ineffectual for its purpose, as any one might have foreseen it would be. The sales, in the remaining half year, amounted to seven millions of dollars, and the total for the year was twenty-four millions. But the same circular, which confessedly was inadequate for its ostensible purpose, was effectual for mischief. It increased the demand for specie, raised its value, became a new element of disorder in our currency, and powerfully assisted to bring on the catastrophe which soon followed. No one can estimate the extent of the injury done by the morbid appetite for gold and silver.

In the bloated expansion produced by the hotbed culture of the Administration, the Treasury had its share; it was filled to bursting. The surplus of nearly forty millions of dollars, which remained after all means for exhausting it had been employed, was directed to be distributed among the States, and the Secretary contrived so to work the distribution as to cause the greatest possible disturbance. Thus, it appears, that we had all the external symptoms of prosperity, and among them an overflowing Treasury, and especially that great desideratum, plenty of gold and silver. When the late President of the United States went out of office, he said that he left us prosperous and happy. So were the people of Natchez at 2 o'clock on the fatal 7th of May. But the elements of destruction accumulated during the preceding seven or eight years, by the fostering care of the Executive, suddenly burst upon us. They are still raging. The vessel of state is among the breakers The effort of every man should be to get her back into deep water. All hands should come upon deck, from the captain to the cabin boy; no skulking below. But the Government, who received her in perfect train well fitted and found; who lost the reckoning, and kept no look out; who seized upon the wheel, when they could not steer; who have, in short, caused the whole disaster—would now take the boat to themselves, carry off the stores, and leave the crew crew and cargo to perish; coldly saying, "you expect too much from us." If any sacrifice is to be made, they should be be thrown overboard first, (I speak of them officially,) who have brought the calamity upon us; they should be cashiered; they should never be trusted again.

There are two principal reasons, at least, why they should take their share of the common distress, and help us to get out of it. They who administered the Government have shared with us their full portion of the fruits of our treacherous prosperity. They have had their coffers well filled. Would they now separate themselves from us in the day of our adversity? Is this the time to ask for a divorce, and take the strong box to themselves? But, further, they have contributed powerfully to that adversity, if they have not been the sole cause. They may have blundered; it is to be hoped they did—for deliberate design to work out such effects would be inhuman and fiendlike. But their blundering has far surpassed what their utmost skill could have accomplished. Nor have they gone on without full warning. At every step they have been told what would be the consequences, and every prediction has been verified, so that now there is no difference between the prophecy and the history. But they disregarded all warnings, as they did all "lamentations" here and elsewhere.

That they are thus chargeable, the proofs are manifest. The whole has occurred in their time and under their management. From 1830 to the present time is the whole period. For this period they are responsible. If this be not enough, it is most obvious that, by the exercise of the powers entrusted to them, they have made the changes which we now deplore, from the solid prosperity of 1830 to the extreme adversity we are now laboring under. They have encourged, nay, they have chiefly caused, all the excesses. The increase and expansion of banks, and bank capital, and bank paper, have been owing to them. The excessively increased sales of public lands met their approbation and favor. They promoted and encourged excessive importations, and especially the excess of importation of gold and silver; and the debt we owe for it. All these things, and the great interests connected with them, instead of being treated cautiously and carefully, as their delicate nature required—instead of being treated with reference to those who were most concerned, and who were best acquainted with them—were subjected to the power of party dogmas, to be received as authoritative, without inquiry, and followed blindly to the consequences, whatever they might cost.

Other and highly interesting views might be taken of this question, but it is time to come to a conclusion. Does any man believe that in the present measure there is a hope of remedy or relief? Will it bring us nearer to that condition of solid prosperity which we enjoyed before this series of disastrous experiments began? The measure itself never was intended for a remedy. The President told us at the extra session that the people expect too much from the Government; and, having prepared them by this admonition, proposed the Sub-Treasury! It will not help the people—that is quite clear. They want a uniform currency, and in sufficient abundance. This will not satisfy their wants in either respect. But, still further—and here it appears to me most plain that the Government is wanting in its duty—it will prejudice the people, and embarrass and cripple their exertions to save themselves, however it may help the Government. The plan of an independent circulation, however it may aggrandize the Government by increasing its patronage and power, will be constantly crossing and jostling the concerns of currency and business. And, finally, the failure of this plan itself will be the argument for establishing that most detestable of all devices, a Government bank! When that comes, our Republican Constitution is virtually at an end.

Whether the plan in this bill is practicable at all, may well be doubted. But having detained the committee so long, I will not enter into that inquiry. I have shown that it contradicts every principle which ought to be regarded in the establishment of a Treasury Department; that it has neither economy nor safety, nor public convenience to recommend it, that it is expensive and wasteful, unsafe and highly inconvenient, and injurious. For these reasons it ought to be rejected.

NOTE.

Extract from Mr. Baldwin's report to the House of Representatives, on "the condition of the Treasury Department," May 22, 1794.

"The Treasurer, pursuant to general directions from the Secretary of the Treasury, keeps the public moneys under his control in the several banks. Formerly the banks of North America, New York, Massachusetts, and Maryland, were places of deposite. At present the public moneys are kept in the Bank of the United States or its several offices of discount and deposite, at Boston, New York, Baltimore, and Charleston, and in the Bank of Providence. The Treasurer has never any public money in his possession or custody, which it is not in fact deposited in bank from the the moment this possession or custody commences till it ceases by the disbursement of it for public purposes, except in the case of bank bills, orders upon individuals, &c. heretofore enumerated, as remittances from the supervisors of the revenue and collectors of the customs to the Treasurer; and those, also, immediately after the receipt of them, constitute deposites in bank, to the credit of the Treasurer.

"The Secretary of the Treasury, or any other officer of the Department besides the Treasurer, never has the possession or custody of any part of the public moneys, (except in cases hereafter specified.) And the possession or custody of the Treasurer is, as already stated, exercised through the banks The only exception to this observation respects certain inconsiderable sums occasionally placed in the hands of the commissioner of the revenue for the service of the light-house establishment, and certain other small sums for the contingencies of the offices of the Secretary, Comptroller, Commissioner of the revenue, and Auditor; and which are, from time, in proportion to to their expenditures, placed in the hands of the Register for disbursement, who renders an account of the disbursement, which undergoes a regular and formal settlement, as other public accounts.—*American State papers, vol. SPEECH OF MR. CORWIN,

OF OHIO.

In the House of Representatives, February 15, 1840.—On the proposition to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to report an appropriation for the continuation of the Cumberland road.

Mr. CORWIN of Ohio rose and said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I am admonished, by the eager solicitations of gentlemen around me to give way for a motion to adjourn, of that practice of the House which accords us more of leisure on this day than is allowed us on any other day of the week. The servants of other good masters are, I believe, indulged in a sort of saturnalium in the afternoon of

Saturday; and we have supposed that our kind masters, the people, might be willing to grant us, their most faithful slaves, a similar respite from toil. It is now past three o'clock in the afternoon, and I should be very willing to pause in the discussion, were I not urged by those menacing cries of "Go on," from various parts of the House. In this state of things, I cannot hope to summon to any thing like attention the unquiet minds of many or the jaded and worn-down faculties of a still larger portion of the House. I hope, however, the House will not withhold from me a boon which I have often seen granted to others, that is, the privilege of speaking without being oppressed by a crowded audience, which is accompanied by this additional advantage, that the orator, thus situated can at least listen to and hear himself.

If you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of this House, have given that attention to the speech of the gentleman from Michigan, (Mr. CRARY,) made yesterday, which some of us here thought it our duty to bestow, I am sure the novelty of the scene, to say nothing more of it, must have arrested your curiosity, if, indeed, it did not give rise to profound reflection.

I need not remind the House that it is a rule here (as I suppose it is every where else where men dispute by any rule at all) that what is said in debate should be relevant and pertinent to the subject under discussion. The question before us is a proposition to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill granting four hundred and fifty thousand dollars to continue the construction of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. The objections to the measure are, either that this Government is in no sense bound by compact to make the road, or that it is not a work of any national concern, but merely of local interest, or that the present exhausted state of the Treasury will not warrant the appropriation, admitting the object of it to be fairly within the constitutional province of Congress.

If the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. PICKENS) and the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. PARRIS,) who consider the Cumberland road a work of mere sectional advantage to a very small portion of the people, have attended to the sage disquisitions of the gentleman from Michigan on the art of war, they must now either come to the conclusion that almost the whole of the gentleman's speech is what old-fashioned people would call a "non sequitur," or else that this road connects itself with not merely the military defences of the Union, but is interwoven most intimately with the progress of science, and especially that most difficult of all sciences, the proper application of strategy to the exigencies of barbarian warfare. It will be seen that the far-seeing sagacity and long-reaching understanding of the gentleman from Michigan has discovered that, before we can vote with a clear conscience on the instructions proposed, we must be well informed as to the number of Indians who fought at the battle of Tippecanoe in 1811; how these savages were painted, whether red, black, or blue, or whether all were blended on their barbarian faces. Further, according to his views of the subject, before we vote money to make a road, we must know and approve of what General Harrison thought, said, and did, at the battle of Tippecanoe!

Again, upon this process of reasoning, we must inquire where a general should be when a batle begins, especially in the night, and what his position during the fight, and where he should be found when it is over; and particularly how a Kentuckian behaves himself when he hears an Indian war-whoop in day or night. And, after settling all these puzzling propositions, still we must fully understand how and by whom the battle of the Thames was fought, and in what manner it then and there became our troops, regular and militia, to conduct themselves. Sir, it must be obvious that if these topics are germain to the subject, then does the Cumberland road encompass all the interests and all the subjects that touch the rights, duties and destinies of the civilized world; and I hope we shall hear no more from Southern gentlemen of the narrow, sectional, or unconstitutional character of the proposed measure. That branch of the subject is, I hope, forever quieted, perhaps unintentionally, by the gentleman from Michigan. His military criticism, if it has not answered the purposes intended, has at least, in this way, done some service to the Cumberland road. And if my poor halting comprehension has not blundered, in pursuing the soaring upward flight of my friend from Michigan, he has in this discussion written a new chapter in the "regulæ philosophandi," and made not ourselves only, but the whole world his debtors in gratitude, by overturning the old worn out principles of the 'inductive system."

Mr. Speaker, there have been many and ponderous volumes written, and various unctuous discourses delivered, on the doctrines of "association." Dugald Stewart, a Scotch gentleman of no mean pretensions in his day, thought much and wrote much concerning that principle in mental philosophy; and Brown, another of the same school, but of later date, has also written and said much on the subject. This latter gentleman, I think, calls it "suggestion;" but never, I venture to say, did any metaphysician, pushing his researches furthest and deepest into that occult science, dream that would come to pass which we have discovered and clearly developed—that is, that two subjects so unlike as an appropriation to a road in 1840, and the tactics proper in Indian war in 1811, were not merely akin, but actually, identically the same.

Mr. Speaker, this discussion, I should think, if not absolutely absurd and utterly ridiculous, which my respect for the gentleman from Michigan and the American Congress will not allow me to suppose, has elicited another trait in the American character which has been the subject of great admiration with intelligent travellers from the old world. Foreigners have admired the ease with which we Yankees, as they call us, can turn our hands to any business or pursuit, public or private; and this has been brought forward by our own people as a proof that man, in this great and free republic, is a being very far superior to the same animal in other parts of the globe less favored than ours. A proof of the most convincing character of this truth, so flattering to our national pride, is exhibited before our eyes in the gentleman from Michigan delivering to the world a grave lecture on the campaigns of Gen. Harrison, including a variety of very interesting military events in the years 1811, 1812, and 1813. In all other countries, and in all former times, before now, a gentleman who would either speak or be listened to, on the subject of war, involving subtle criticisms on strategy, and careful reviews of marches, seiges, battles, regular and casual, and irregular onslaughts, would be required to show, first, that he had studied much, investigated fully, and digested well, the science and history of his subject. But here, sir, no such painful preparation is required; witness the gentleman from Michigan. He has announced to the House that he is a militia general on the peace establishment!! That he is a lawyer we know, tolerably well read in Tidd's Practice and Espanasses Nisi Prius. These studies, so happily adapted to the subject of war, with an appointment in the militia in time of peace, furnish him at once with all the knowledge necessary to discourse to us, as from high authority, upon all the mysteries in the "trade of death." Again, Mr. Speaker, it must occur to every one that we, to whom these questions are submitted and these criticisms are addressed, being all colonels at least, and most of us, like the gentleman himself, brigadiers, are, of all conceivable tribunals, best qualified to decide any nice point connected with military science. I hope the House will not be alarmed by an impression that I am about to discuss one or the other of the military questions now before us at length, but I wish to submit a remark or two, by way of preparing us for a proper appreciation of the merits of the discourse we have heard. I trust, as we are all brother officers, that the gentleman from Michigan and the two hundred and forty colonels or generals of this honorable House, will receive what I have to say as coming from an old brother in arms, and addressed to them in a spirit of candor,

"Such as becomes comrades free,
Reposing after victory."

Sir, we all know the military studies of the gentleman from Michigan before he was promoted. I take it to be beyond a reasonable doubt, that he had perused with great care the title page of "Baron Steuben." Nay, I go further; as the gentleman has incidentally assured us he is prone to look into musty and neglected volumes, I venture to assert, without vouching the fact from personal knowledge, that he has prosecuted his researches so far, as to be able to know that the rear rank stands right behind the front. This, I think, is fairly inferrible from what I understood him to say of the two lines of encampment at Tippecanoe. Thus we see, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Michigan, so far as study can give us knowledge of a subject, comes before us with claims to great profundity. But this is a subject which, of all others, requires the aid of actual experience to make us wise. Now the gentleman from Michigan, being a militia general, as he has told us, his brother officers, in that simple statement has revealed the glorious history of toils, privations, sacrifices, and bloody scenes, through which we know, from experience and observation, a militia officer in time of peace is sure to pass. We all, in fancy, now see the gentleman from Michigan in that most dangerous and glorious event in the life of a militia general on the peace establishment—a parade day! The day for which all the other days of his life seem to have been made. We can see the troops in motion; umbrellas, hoe and axe handles, and other like deadly implements of war overshadowing all the field, when lo! the leader of the host approaches, his plume, white, after the fashion of the great Borubon, is of ample length, and reads its doleful history in the bereaved necks and bosoms of forty neighboring hen-roosts! Like the great Suwaroff, he seems somewhat careless in forms and points of dress; hence his epaulettes may be on his shoulders, back or sides, but still gleaming, gloriously gleaming in the sun. Mounted he is, too, let it not be forgotten. Need I describe to the colonels and generals of this honorable House the steed which heroes bestride on such occasions? No, I see the memory of other days is with you. You see before you the gentleman from Michigan mounted on his crop-eared, bushy-tailed mare, the singular obliquities of whose hinder limbs is described by that most expressive phrase, 'sick e hams"—her heighth just fourteen hands, "all told;" yes, sir, there you see his "steed that laughs at the shaking of the spear;" that is, his "war-horse whose neck is clothed with thunder." Mr. Speaker, we have glowing descriptions in history of Alexander the Great and his war-horse Bucephalus, at the head of the invincible Macedonian phalanx, but, sir, such are the improvements of modern times, that every one must see that our militia general, with his crop-eared mare, with bushy tail and pickle ham, would literally frighten off a battle field an hundred Alexanders. But, sir, to the history of the parade day. The general thus mounted and equipped is in the field, and ready for action. On the eve of some desperate enterprise, such as giving order to shoulder arms, it may be, there occurs a crisis, one of the accidents of war which no sagacity could foresee or prevent. A cloud rises and passes over the sun! Here an occasion occurs for the display of that greatest of all traits in the character of a commander, that tact which enables him to seize upon and turn to good account events unlooked for as they arise. Now for the caution wherewith the Roman Fabius foiled the skill and courage of Hannibal. A retreat is ordered, and troops and general, in a twinkling, are found safely bivouaced in a neighboring grocery! But even here the general still has room for the exhibition of heroic deeds. Hot from the field, and chaffed with the untoward events of the day, your general unsheaths his trenchant blade, eighteen inches in length, as you will well remember, and with an energy and remorseless fury he slices the watermelons that lie in heaps around him, and shares them with his surviving friends. Other of the sinews of war are not wanting here. Whiskey, Mr. Speaker, that great leveller of modern times, is here also, and the shells of the watermelons are filled to the brim. Here again, Mr. Speaker, is shown how the extremes of barbarism and civilization meet. As the Scandinavian heroes of old, after the fatigues of war, drank wine from the skulls of their slaughtered enemies, in Odin's Halls, so now our militia general and his forces, from the skulls of melons thus vanquished, in copious draughts of whiskey assuage the heroic fire of their souls, after the bloody scenes of a parade day. But, alas, for this short-lived race of ours, all things will have an end, and so even is it with the glorious achievements of our general. Time is on the wing, and will not stay his flight; the sun, as if frightened at the mighty events of the day, rides down the sky, and at the close of the day when "the hamlet is still," the curtain of night drops upon the scene;

"Far off his coming shines;"

"And glory, like the phœnix in its fires, Exhales its odors, blazes, and expires."

Such, sir, has been the experience in war of the gentleman from Michigan. We know this from the simple annunciation that he is and has been a brigadier of militia in time of peace; and now, having a full understanding of the qualifications of our learned general, both from study and practice, I hope the House will see that it should give its profound reflection to his discourses on the art of war. And this it will be more inclined to, when we take into view that the gentleman has, in his review of General Harrison's campaigns, modestly imputed to the latter great mistakes, gross blunders, imbecility, and even worse than this, as I shall show hereafter. The force, too, of the lecture of our learned and experienced friend from Michigan is certainly greatly enhanced, when we consider another admitted fact, which is, that the general whose imbecility and errors he has discovered had not, like the gentleman from Michigan, the great advantage of serving in watermelon campaigns, but only fought fierce Indians in the dark forests of the West, under such stupid fellows as Anthony Wayne, and was afterwards appointed to the command of large armies by the advice of such an inexperienced boy as Gov. Shelby, the hero of King's Mountain.

And now, Mr. Speaker, as I have the temerity to entertain doubts, and with great deference to differ in my opinions on this military question with the gentleman from Michigan, I desire to state a few historical facts concerning General Harrison, whom the general from Michigan has pronounced incapable, imbecile, and, as I shall notice hereafter, something worse even than these. General Harrison was commissioned by General Washington an officer in the regular army of the United States in the year 1791. He served as aid to General Anthony Wayne, in the campaign against the Indians, which resulted in the battle of the Rapids of the Maumee, in the fall of 1794. Thus, in his youth, he was selected by General Wayne as one of his military family. And what did this youthful officer do in that memorable battle of the Rapids? Here, Mr. Speaker, let me summon a witness merely to show how military men may differ. The witness I call to controvert the opinion of the gentleman from Michigan is General Anthony Wayne. In his letter to the Secretary of War, giving an account of the battle of the Rapids, he says:

"My faithful and gallant Lieutenant Harrison rendered the most essential services, by communicating my orders in every direction, and by his conduct and bravery exciting the troops to press for victory."

Sir, this evidence was given by General Wayne in the year 1794, some time, I imagine, before the gentlemen from Michigan was born, and long before he became a militia general, and long, very long, before he ever perused the title page of Baron Steuben. Mr. Speaker, let me remind the House, in passing, that this battle and victory over the Indian forces of the Northwest, in which, according to the testimony of Gen. Wayne, "Lieutenant Harrison rendered the most essential services by his conduct and bravery," gave peace to an exposed line of frontier, extending from Pittsburgh to the southern borders of Tennessee. It was, in truth, the close of the war of the Revolution, for the Indians who took part with Great Britain in our Revolutionary struggle never laid down their arms until after they were vanquished by Wayne in 1794.

We now come to see something of the man, the general, whose military history our able and experienced general from Michigan has reviewed. We know that debates like this have sometimes been had in the British Parliament. There, I believe, the discussion was usually conducted by those in the House who have seen, and not merely heard, of service. We all know that Colonel Napier has, in several volumes, reviewed the campaigns of Wellington, and criticised the movements and merits of Beresford, and Soult, and Massena, and many others, quite, yes, I say quite as well known in military history as any of us, not even excepting our general from Michigan. We respect the opinions of Napier, because we know he not only thought of war, but that he fought too. We respect and admire that combination of military skill, with profound statesmanlike views, which we find in "Cæsar's Commentaries," because we know the "mighty Julius" was a soldier, trained in the field, and inured to the accidents and dangers of war. But, sir, we generals of Congress require no such painful discipline to give value to our opinions. We men of the 19th century know all things intuitively. We understand perfectly the military art by nature. Yes, sir, the notions of the gentleman from Michigan, agree exactly with a sage by the name of "Dogberry," who insisted that "reading and writing come by nature." Mr. Speaker, we have heard and read much of "the advance of knowledge, the improvement of the species, and the great march of mind," but never till now have we understood the extent of meaning in these pregnant phrases. For instance, the gentleman from Michigan asserts that General Harrison has none of the qualities of a general, because, at the battle of Tippecanoe he was found at one time at a distance from his tent, urging his men on to battle. He exposed his person too much, it seems. He should have staid at his tent, and waited for the officers to come to him for orders. Well, sir, see now to what conclusion this leads us. Napoleon seized a standard at Lodi, and rushed in front of his columns across a narrow bridge, which was swept by a whole park of German artillery. Hence, Napoleon was no officer; he did not know how to command an army. He, like Harrison, exposed his person too much. Oh, Mr. Speaker, what a pity for poor Napoleon that he had not studied Steuben, and slaughtered water-melons with us natural born generals of this great age of the world! Sir, it might have altered the map of Europe; nay, changed the destinies of the world!

Again: Alexander the Great spurred his horse foremost into the river, and led his Macedonians across the Granicus, to rout the Persians who stood full opposed on the other side of the stream. True, this youth conquered the world, and made himself master of what had constituted the Medean, Persian, Assyrian, and Chaldean empires. Still, according to the judgment of us warriors by nature, the mighty Macedonian would have consulted good sense by coming over here, if, indeed, there were any here hereabouts in those days, and studying, like my friend from Michigan, first Tidd's Practice, and Espanasse's Nisi Prius, and a little snatch of Steuben, and serving as a general of militia awhile. Sir, Alexander the Great might have made a man of himself in the art of war, had he even been a member of our Congress, and heard us colonels discuss the subject of an afternoon or two. Indeed, Alexander, or Satan, I doubt not, would have improved greatly in strategy by observing, during this session, the tactics of the Administration party on the New Jersey election question. Mr. Speaker, this objection to a general, because he will fight, is not original with my friend from Michigan. I remember a great authority, in point, agreeing with the gentleman in this. In the times of the Henrys, 4th and 5th, of England, there lived one Captain Jack Falstaff. If Shakspeare may be trusted, his opinions of the art military were exactly those of the gentleman from Michigan. He uniformly declared as his deliberate judgment on the subject, that "discretion was the better part of valor;" and this is an authority for the gentleman. But who shall decide? Thus the authority stands—Alexander the mighty Greek, and Napoleon Bonaparte, and Harrison, on one side, and Captain John Falstaff and the General from Michigan on the other! Sir, I must leave a question thus sustained by authorities, both ways, to posterity. Perhaps the lights of another age may enable the world to decide it, I confess my inability to say on which side the weight of authority lies.

I hope I may obtain the pardon of the American Congress for adverting in this discussion to another matter, gravely put forward by the gentleman from Michigan. Without the slightest feeling of disrespect to that gentleman, I must be allowed to say that his opinions, (hastily I am sure,) obtruded on the House on this military question, can only be considered as subjects of merriment.

But I come to notice, since I am compelled to it, one observation of the gentleman, which I feel quite certain, on reflection, he will regret himself. In a sort of parenthesis in his speech, he said that a rumor prevailed at the time (alluding to the battle of Tippecanoe) that Colonel Joseph H. Davies of Kentucky, who commanded a squadron of cavalry there, was, by some trick of General Harrison, mounted, during the battle, on a white horse belonging to the General, and that, being thus conspicuous in the fight, he was a mark for the assailing Indians, and fell in a charge at the head of his men. The gentleman says he does not vouch for the truth of this. Sir, it is well that he does not vouch here for the truth of a long exploded slander. It requires a bold man, a man possessing a great deal of moral courage, to make even an allusion to a charge such as that, against one whose only possessions in this world are his character for courage and conduct in war in his country's defence, and his unstained integrity in the various civil offices it has been his duty to occupy. Did not the gentleman know that this vile story was known by every intelligent man west of the mountains to be totally without foundation? The gentleman seemed to appeal to the gallant Kentuckians to prove the truth of this inuendo. He spoke of the blood of their countrymen so profusely poured out at Tippecanoe, as if they would give countenance to the idea that the gallant Davies, who fell in that engagement, fell a victim to the artifice of the commanding general, and their other gallant sons who fell there, were wantonly sacrificed by the gross ignorance of General Harrison in Indian warfare. Now, sir, before the gentleman made his appeal, he should have remembered a few historical facts, which, if known to him, as I should suppose they were to every other man twenty years of age in Western America, would make the whole speech of that gentleman little else than a most wanton insult to the understanding of the people and Government of Kentucky. Let us briefly notice the facts.

In November, 1811, the battle of Tippecanoe was fought. There Colonel Davies and Colonel Owens, with other Kentuckians, fell. These, says the gentleman, (at least he insinuates it,) were sacrificed by either the cowardly artifice or by the ignorance of General Harrison. Now, Mr. Speaker, I abhor the habit of open flattery, nay, I do not like to look in the face of a man, and speak of him in warm terms of eulogium, however he may deserve it; but, sir, on this occasion I am obliged to say what history will attest of the people of Kentucky. If any community of people ever lived, from the time of the dispersion on the plain of Shinar up to this day, who were literally cradled in war, it is to be found in the State of Kentucky. From the first exploration of the country by Daniel Boon up to the year 1794, they were engaged in one incessant battle with the savages of the West. Trace the path of an Indian incursion any where over the great valley of the West, and you will find it red with Kentucky blood. Wander over any of the battle fields of that great theatre of savage war, and you will find it white with the bones of her children. In childhood they fought the Indians, with their sisters and mothers, in their dwellings. In youth and ripe manhood they fought them in ambuscades and open battle fields. Such were the men of Kentucky in 1811, when the battle of Tippecanoe was fought. There, too, as we know, they were still found, foremost where life was to be lost, or glory won; and there they were commanded by General Harrison. Now, sir, if in that battle General Harrison had not conducted as became a soldier and a general, would not such men have seen and known it? Did Kentucky in 1811, mourning as she then did the loss of one of her greatest and most valued citizens, condemn (as the gentleman from Michigan has attempted to) the conduct of the General who commanded in that battle? Let us see how they testified.

In January, 1812, two months after the battle of Tippecanoe, the Legislature of Kentucky was in session. On the 7th of January, 1812, the following resolution passed that body:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Kentucky, That in the late campaign against the Indians upon the Wabash, Governor William Henry Harrison has behaved like a hero, a patriot, and a general; and that for his cool, deliberate, skilful, and gallant conduct in the battle of Tippecanoe, he well deserves the warmest thanks of his country and his nation."

Mr. Speaker, the resolution I have just read was presented by JOHN J. CRITTENDEN, now a Senator from the State of Kentucky, whom to name is to call to the minds of all who know him a man whose urbanity and varied accomplishments present a model of an American gentleman—whose wisdom, eloquence, and integrity have won for him the first rank amongst American statesmen. Such a man, with both branches of the Kentucky Legislature, have testified, two months only after the event took place, that, in the campaign and battle of Tippecanoe, General Harrison combined the skill and conduct of an able commander with the valor of a soldier, and the patriotism of an American. Who rises up twenty-eight years afterwards to contradict this? The young gentleman from Michigan! He who, at the time referred to, was probably conning Webster's spelling book in some village school in Connecticut. But, Mr. Speaker, I must call another witness upon the point in issue here. On the 12th of November, 1811, the Territorial Legislature of Indiana was in session. This is just five days after the battle. That Legislature, through the Speaker of its House of Representatives, General Wm. Johnson, addressed General Harrison in the following terms:

'SIR: The House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory, in their own name, and in behalf of their constituents, most cordially reciprocate the congratulations of your Excellency on the glorious result of the late sanguinary conflict with the Shawnee Prophet, and the tribes of Indians confederated with him. When we see displayed in behalf of our country not only the consummate abilities of the general, but the heroism of the man; and when we take into view the benefits which must result to that country from those exertions, we cannot for a moment withhold our meed of applause."

Here, sir, we have two Legislatures of the States whose citizens composed the militia force at Tippecanoe, grieved and smarting under the loss of their fellow-citizens, uniting in solemn council in bearing their testimony to the skill and bravery displayed by General Harrison in that battle, which the gentleman from Michigan, with a self-complacency that might well pass for insanity, now says he has discovered was marked by palpable incapacity in the commanding General. But, Mr. Speaker, I must call yet another, nay, several other witnesses, to confront the opinion of the Michigan General.

In August, 1812, about nine months after the battle of Tippecanoe, news of fearful import concerning the conduct of General Hull, reached Ohio and Kentucky. Our army had fallen back on Detroit, and rumors of the surrender of that place to the British, which did actually take place, were floating on every breeze. Three regiments of militia were immediately raised in Kentucky. Before these troops had taken the field, it was well known that our army under Hull, with the whole Territory of Michigan, had been surrendered to the combined British and Indian forces, commanded by Brock and Tecumseh. Our whole frontier in the Northwest lay bare and defenceless to the invasion, not only of the British army, but the more terrible incursion of a savage foe, hungry for plunder and thirsting for blood, led on by the most bold and accomplished warrior that the tribes of the red man had ever preduced. In this state of peril, the gallant army of Kentucky looked round for a leader equal to the imminent and momentous crisis. There was Scott, the then Governor of Kentucky, who had fought through the Revolutionary war, and under the eye of Washington had risen to the rank of brigadier in the regular service. There, too, was the veteran Shelby, one of the heroes of King's Mountain, a name that shall wake up the tones of enthusiasm in every American heart while heroic courage is esteemed, or lofty integrity remains a virtue. There, too, was Clay, whose trumpet tongue in this hall was worth a thousand cannon in the field. These were convened in council. This, let us not forget, was about nine months after the battle of Tippecanoe. Whom, sir, I ask, did these men select to lead their own friends and fellow-citizens on to this glorious enterprise? Their laws required that their militia should be commanded by one of their own citizens; yet passing by Scott and Shelby, and thousands of their own brave sons, this council called General Harrison, then Governor of Indiana—he who had commanded Kentuckians but nine months before at Tippecanoe—he who, according to the gentleman from Michigan, had shown no trait but imbecility, as an officer—he, against the laws of Kentucky, was by such a council asked to resign his station as Governor of Indiana, and take the rank and commission of Major General in the Kentucky militia, and lead on her armies in that fearful hour, to redeem our national disgrace, and snatch from British domination and savage butchery the very country now represented by the gentleman from Michigan. I have yet one other witness to call against the gentleman from Michigan. Sir, if the last rest of the illustrious dead is disturbed in this unnatural war upon a living soldier's honor, and a living patriot's fame, the fault is not mine. It will appear presently that the gentleman from Michigan has—unwittingly, it may be—dishonored and insulted the dead, and charged the pure and venerated Madison with hypocrisy and falsehood. If General Harrison had been the weak, wicked, or imbecile thing the gentleman from Micigan would now pretend, was not this known to Mr. Madison, then President of the United States, who gave the orders under which General Harrison acted, and to whom the latter was responsible for his conduct? Surely no one can suppose that there were wanting those who, if they could have done so with truth, would have made known any conduct of General Harrison at the time referred to which seemed in any degree worthy of reprehension. With all these means of information, what was the testimony of Mr. Madison respecting the battle of Tippecanoe? I will quote his own words from his message to Congress about a month after the event. The message is dated 18th December, 1811, and reads as follows:

"While it is deeply lamented that so many valuable lives have been lost in the action which took place on the 7th ultimo, Congress will see with satisfaction the dauntless spirit of fortitude victoriously displayed by every description of troops engaged, as well as the collected firmness which distinguished their commander on an occasion requiring the utmost exertions of valor and discipline."

Mr. Speaker, I have no pleasure in thus recapitulating and piling proof upon proof to repel an insinuation, which I think is now apparent to all has been thrown out in the madness of party rage, without consideration, and founded only on a total perversion, or rather flat contradiction, of every historical record having relation to the subject.

Something was said by the gentleman from Michigan about the encampment at Tippecanoe. If I understood him rightly, he condemned it as injudicious, because it had a river on one side and a morass on another. Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall give no opinion on the question thus stated; but it just now occurs to me that this very subject, which I think in the military vocabulary is called castrametation, admits of some serious injury bearing upon the criticism under consideration. In almost all scientific research, we find that what is now reduced to system, and arises to the dignity of science, was at first the product of some casualty, which, falling under the notice of some reflecting mind, gave rise to surprising results. The accidental falling of an apple developed the great law of gravitation. I am sure I have somewhere seen it stated that Pyrrhus, the celebrated King of Epirus, who is allowed by all authority to have been the first general of his time, first learned to fortify his camp by having a river in his rear and a morass on his flank; and this was first suggested to him, by seeing a wild boar, when hunted to desperation, back himself against a tree or rock, that he might fight his pursuers without danger of being assailed in his rear. Now, sir, if I comprehend the gentleman from Michigan he has against him on this point not only the celebrated king of Epirus, but also the wild boar, who, it seems, was the tutor of Pyrrhus in the art of castrametation Here, then, are two appoved authorities, one of whom nature taught the art of war, as she kndly did us colonels, and the other that renowned hero of Epirus, who gave the Romans so much trouble in his time. These authorities are near two thousand years old, and, as far as I know, unquestioned, till the gentleman from Michigan attacked them yesterday. Here, again, I ask who shall decide? Pyrrhus and the boar on one side, and the gentleman from Michigan on the other. Sir, I decline jurisdiction of the question, and leave the two hundred and forty colonels of this House to settle the contest "non nostrum tantes componere lites."

Mr. Speaker, I feel it quite impossible to withdraw from this part of the debate without some comment on another assertion, or rather intimation, of the gentleman from Michigan, touching the conduct of General Harrison at the battle of the Thames. All who have made themselves acquainted with the history of that event, know that the order which the American army was to attack the combined force of British and Indians at the Thames was changed at the very moment when the onset was about to be made. This order of the General drew forth from Commodore Perry and others, who were in the staff of the army, and on the ground at the time, the highest encomiums. The idea of this change in the plan of attack, it is now intimated, was not original with General Harrison, but was, as the gentleman seems to intimate, suggested to him by another, who, it is said, was on ground at the time. Who that other person is, or was, the gentleman has not said, but seemed to intimate he was now in the other end of the capitol! and thus we are led to suppose that the gentleman intends to say that Colonel Johnson, the Vice President, is the gentleman alluded to. Sir, I regret very much that the gentleman should treat historical facts in this way. If there be any foundation for giving Colonel Johnson the honor of having suggested to General Harrison a movement for which the latter has received great praise, why not speak out and say so? Why insinuate? Why hint or suppose on a subject susceptible of easy and positive proof? Does not the gentleman know that he is thus trifling with the character of a soldier, playing with reputation dearer than property or life to its possessor? Sir, I wish to know if Col. Johnson, the Vice President of the United States, has, by any word or act of his, given countenance to this insinuation? It would be well for all who speak at random on this subject to remember that there are living witnesses yet who can testify to the point in question. It may not be amiss to remind some that there is extant a journal of Colonel Wood, who afterwards fell on the Niagara frontier. For the benefit of such, I too, will state what can be proved in relation to the change made by General Harrisen in the order of attack at the Thames.

The position of the British and Indians had been reported to General Harrison by volunteer officers—brave men, it is true, but who, like many of us, were officers who had not seen a great deal of hard fighting. On this report the order of attack first intended was founded, but, before the troops were ordered on to the attack, Colonel Wood was sent to examine and report the extent of front occupied by the British troops. Colonel Wood's military eye detected at once what had escaped the unpractised observation of the others—that is, that the British regulars were drawn up in open order—and it was on his report that, at the moment, the change was made by General Harrison in the order of the attack—a movement which, in the estimation of such men as Wood and Perry, and Shelby, was enough of itself to entitle General Harrison to the highest rank among the military men of the age.

Mr. Speaker, when I review the historical testimony touching this portion of General Harrison's history, I confess my amazement at the Quixotic, (I pray my friend from Michigan to pardon me,) but I must call it the Quixotic exhibition which he has made of himself. Sir, the gentleman had no need to tell us he was a general of militia. His conduct in this discussion is proof of that—strong even as is his own word for the fact. He has shown all that reckless bravery which has always characterized our noble militia, but he has also, in this attack, shown that other quality of militia troops which so frequently impels them to rush blindly forward, and often to their own destruction. I should like to hear many of the brave men around me speak of General Harrison. Some there are now under my eye who carry British bullets in their bodies, received while fighting under the command of General Harrison. I should be glad to hear my whole-souled and generous-hearted friend from Kentucky, [Major BUTLER,] who agrees with the gentleman from Michigan in general politics, who has not merely heard of battle, but who has mingled in war in all its forms, and fought his way from the ranks up to the head of a battalion—I say I should be glad to hear his opinions of the matters asserted, hinted at, and insinuated by the gentleman from Michigan.

Why, I ask, is this attempt to falsify the common history of our country made now, and why is it made here? Is it vainly imagined that Congressional speeches are to contradict accredited, long-known historical facts? Does the fierce madness of party indulge a conception so wild?

Sir, I repeat, that I feel only amazement at such an attempt. I could not sit still and witness it in silence. Much as I desired to speak to the House and the country on the question touching the Cumberland road, I should have left it to others had I not been impelled to get the floor to bear my testimony against the gross injustice which I thought was about to be done to a citizen—an honored cherished citizen of my own State. This House Mr. Speaker, knows that I am not given to much babbling here. Yes, sir, you all know that, like Balaam's ass, I never speak here till I am kicked into it. I may claim credit, therefore, for sincerity, when I declare that a strong sense of justice alone could have called me into this debate. Let me now remind gentlemen who may be tempted into a similar course with my friend from Michigan, that all such efforts must recoil with destructive effect upon those who make them. Sir, it has been the fortune of General Harrison to be identified with the civil and military history of this country for nearly half a century. What is to be gained, even to party, by perverting that history? Nothing. You may blot out a page of his biography here, and tear out a chapter of history there; nay, you may, in the blindness of party rage, rival the Vandal and the Turk, and burn up all your books, and what then have you effected? Nothing but an insane exhibition of impotent party violence. General Harrison's history would still remain in the memory of his and your cotemporaries; and coming events, not long to be delayed, will show to the world that his history, in both legislation and war, dwells not merely in the memories of his countrymen, but is enshrined in their gratitude and engraven upon their hearts.

Mr. Speaker, I come now to the discussion of what is really the question before the House, and, with the hope that I may be entitled to the floor on Monday, I will, if it be the pleasure of the House, give way for a motion to adjourn. If I can obtain the floor on Monday, I promise the House that nothing shall tempt me to wander from the question touching the appropriation for the Cumberland road, a work which, if it be not crushed by the wretched policy of this Administration, will reflect as much glory upon your civil history as the deeds of the great and patriotic citizen whose conduct I have been compelled to notice, ever did upon your military annals.

SYNOPSIS OF THE SPEECH OF

MR. JULIUS C. ALFORD,

OF GEORGIA,

In the House of Representatives, June, 1840, against the Sub-Treasury Bill.

Mr. COOPER, of Georgia, obtained the floor, and remarked that he had postponed the speech he intended to make in favor of the bill, in hope that some of his colleagues, opposed to the measure, would have preceded him in the debate. Mr. ALFORD said, if my colleague will yield the floor, I will oblige him. Mr. COOPER gave way, and

Mr. ALFORD said: Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the sub-Treasury scheme, and have been from the time it was first recommended by Mr. Van Buren to Congress. Upon this question I differ with three of my colleagues, the two who have addressed the committee, (Messrs. BLACK and COLQUITT,) and my friend who has so kindly allowed me to go before him in this debate, (Mr. COOPER.) Before I enter upon the merits of the bill, I will say a word in reply to my colleagues, who have labored to "define" their new "position."

My colleagues who have addressed the committee admit, in this debate, that they are now supporting Mr. Van Buren, because he is a sub-Treasury President. When they were elected by the State Rights party of Georgia, he was then, as he now is, an advocate of this scheme, and they knew it; so were they, but still, at that time they were opposed to Mr. Van Buren. They allege that this measure is the sole cause of their adhesion to the party, and that it is justly considered by themselves the true test of their political faith. It would look better if they had said so before the election, to the people of Georgia, and not come into Congress the friends of the scheme, and the enemies of the President, and now avow themselves the friends of both. They allege that they have been "proscribed" by the State Rights party on account of this measure. I answer, not so. The people elected them with a full knowledge of their friendship for this system of finance; in fact, we agreed that a difference of opinion on this question should not separate us as a party. Accordingly the people elected us; we came here—six of us "are as we were;" you are in a new "position," easily "defined." You are Van Burenized in full; gone over "horse, foot, and dragoons." You have not been "proscribed" because you support the measure. No such thing. You are rejected because you support the man—the head of the party.

You, gentlemen, place what you are pleased to call your defence on a false issue. You allege that you are "proscribed" for your devotion to principle. Not so. The action of the people is founded upon the opinion that you have deserted them, and gone over to Van Buren; and that is the true issue. The people of the State Rights party have rejected you, because they believe you have joined the side of power, at a time when every patriot should be true to the people. You "appeal" from their decision; that is, from your friends to your enemies; or, in other words, from your old friends to your new ones. These remarks are made "more in sorrow than in anger," but they are necessary, after what you have said in your assumed "defence." They are necessary in behalf of the people, whom you charge with "proscription," and are necessary to a proper understanding of our separation here—politically I mean, for I desire our personal relations should remain friendly, as they were in by-gone days. We marched in the same column; we fought in the same ranks; we conquered in the same glorious cause, and triumphed over a common enemy; but now, alas! when we should do battle again in the same cause, against the same enemy, you are found in his camp. I deplore the separation, but I cannot give up the contest. If I fall, I fall with my friends: that will be glory enough. If you are triumphant, you rise with your enemies, and that would dishonor you; but whether you rise or fall, the great moral effect will be the same: that man who gains power or distinction by a desertion of his friends will sink at last, and die "unhonored and unsung."

Mr. Chairman, I am now done with my colleagues, and their "defence." I cannot answer all they have said—time would fail. They have said much, and written more. They feel, no doubt, the necessity of prompt "defence." They are satisfied, I hope, after making a speech apiece, and answering every newspaper squib with a pamphlet.

This act, for the collection, safekeeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue, is in itself sufficiently explicit of its pretended character, and would seem to indicate some necessity for its passage. To me the whole scheme appears deceptive; and I believe, instead of what it purports to be, it is, in truth and fact, a bill to confirm and legalize the usurpations of General Jackson in the person of Mr. Van Buren and his successors. It is a bill to give the President the supreme control of the people's purse. In opposition to the whole bill, I lay down the proposition that there is not now, nor ever has been, any necessity for such an act; or, in other words, that the existing laws are sufficient, if executed by able and honest agents, to collect, keep safe, transfer, and disburse the public revenue.

Under the act of 1789, and its various amendments, we have a system of finance almost perfect; and no instance of a failure in its operations has occurred, to my knowledge, on account of the law, but in every instance the defalcations have been strictly personal. The law is good enough; the fault is in those who administer it. We have a Treasury Department by law; we have a Secretary of the Treasury by law; we have collectors; we have auditors and clerks; and officers enough, God knows, all authorized by law; and we have a building large enough and strong enough to hold all the gold and silver in America. What else do we need? Nothing but honest agents; men capable and honest, and willing to do their duty.

My colleague (Mr. COLQUITT) asked emphatically, in his speech the other day, what is the remedy proposed by those who oppose this bill? He said we had none. I have one of my own. I have not consulted anybody. I have kept it to myself for this moment. I meet his interrogatory. I answer it. My scheme is short, good, effectual, and all will agree it would do the work. Let alone the banks and sub-Treasury, and turn out of office every rogue in the Government, and appoint honest men in their stead.

In this debate, now of six weeks' duration, not a speaker, that I have heard, has noticed the fact that we have existing laws on this subject at all. This confusion comes out of the conflict of parties, and this unholy and unnecessary war upon the currency. It began with General Jackson and the Bank of the United States—it arose out of no necessity of a change of the deposites—it had its origin in political warfare. The bank would not support the General, and he went to war. He waged an exterminating warfare against the bank—he killed it off—he dug it up, and killed it over again—and ever since the death of the bank, the party have been making capital out of an unjust war against a dead enemy. Every little Locofoco-Morus Multicaulis-Van Buren demagogue digs up the bones of the monster, and pops off his blow-gun at the dead enemy, then throws up his cap, and shouts for the sub-Treasury. Next came the pet-bank system, which, in the hands of a tyrant master, fell at the first fire. There was no fair trial of this system. We cannot tell, from the experiment, whether it would do or not. They were used by the Government to help to kill the United States Bank, and were then thrust aside as useless allies, and are now denounced and abused by the party as rotten, insolvent, dishonest, and dangerous monopolies. All I can say is, they are the work of the party.

Mr. Chairman, the history of this war upon the currency is curious enough—it was all passion, no reason. As soon as General Jackson became angry with the State banks, he swore he would have no more to do with banks of any sort, and forthwith issued the famous specie circular, which was in itself the forerunner of this bill of abominations, and, in its practical effect, demonstrated a miniature picture of what is to be the widespread ruin of this last experiment upon the currency; for truly, sir, the people cannot bear another. They are exhausted by the war on the banks, the specie circular, and the anticipated operations of the sub-Treasury.

The divorce of Government and banks began to be felt with all its force on the issuing of the specie circular. It was issued just about the time the western lands came into market. The rich office-holders hastened to the west, with great quantities of gold and silver, ready to meet the sales. The home of many a poor man was brought into market, and he had prepared himself with bills, that passed a week before for land, to buy his own improvements; but the day of sale came, and with it came the specie circular—his money would not buy his home, the speculator bought it over his head, and turned him out, with his wife and children, into the forest, homeless and houseless. This was one of the first acts of this ruinous device of one currency for the Government and none for the people.

Mr. Chairman, I have spoken of this bill—of what it purports to be. I have said I believed there was no necessity for such a law, and stated facts, in relation to existing laws organizing the Treasury Department, showing the truth of that position. It has never been disproved—it cannot be. The condition of the finances before they were tampered with, and their condition now, is proof enough. Why, then, are we still urged to adopt this odious scheme—to make this fearful experiment? Is it not because it is to be an engine of political power in the hands of the President? Look at the nature and character of the whole plan—then contemplate its fearful consequences. First, its fine and costly buildings; next, its strong boxes—these to be located at almost every strong point in the Union; then comes its innumerable offices, all to be filled by the President with partisan slaves, removable at his will—collectors, receivers, keepers, messengers, turnkeys, rogues and runaways, swartwouts, &c. Then there must be money raised, to be collected, safely kept, transferred, and stolen. From a knowledge of the fact that more money would be needed to do all this than the people would allow, and the fear that the bill would be defeated if the truth was made known, you have not specified the amount, but have appropriated the people's money without limitation as to the sum. You dare not do it. You make a great splutter about your ways and means. There are more ways than means—all ways and no means, and mean ways at that. No offence to the committee; I only mean it is extremely deceitful to make such a parade about your money when you have not a dollar. You intend to get money, honestly if you can; but you intend to have it, any way.

Mr. Chairman, I have said we should contemplate the fearful effects of the practical operation of this measure upon the people of this country. I may add, upon their Government, as well as their interest. Let us, in some measure, judge of the future by the past. The anticipated operation of the sub-Treasury has already crippled your commerce, impoverished your merchants, reduced the price of produce as well as labor, and brought infinite distress upon the country. Compare our condition now, with what it was when the Administration came into power. Every honest candid man admits we are infinitely more oppressed now than we were at that time. I mean the people—I am one of them. It is true, these lordly office-holders say they can see no distress. They feel none, I dare say; they have high wages, paid in gold and silver, and cannot see, because they will not; they look over the heads of the people—they fix their sights too high: lower your sights, gentlemen—go with me to see the people. I will show you an alarming condition of things, if you will open your eyes—all mainly growing out of this thrice-rejected system. I will show you the judgments, executions, and sheriffs' sales now in full play over the country. I will point to you the husband leading his wife, followed by the weeping children, to the place of sale, all carrying the last bed, or horse, or cow, to be sold to pay a debt contracted before you made war on the banks and currency, and which would have been easily paid but for your golden humbug.

Mr. Chairman, I mentioned the effect on the people by your action on the banks. Your measures have been directed mainly against the banks, and have been so harsh and tyrannical that they are all virtually closed. Whatever may be said against the banks, they are the only places where the people can get any money to pay their debts, and every effort you make to ruin them tells upon the people. The banks furnish the only medium of circulation, and have all the gold and silver. Your oppressions constrain them to curtail their discounts and call in their debts at this time of general distress. The effect is ruinous—absolutely ruinous. Whether the banks were proper or not in the beginning, they are now a part and parcel of our system, and the means used to destroy them operate on the whole community. The people own the banks, and the people owe the banks. Their relations to each other are mutual, and war upon one injures the other. I have been accused of being more friendly to the banks than formerly. I confess it. I resisted their creation; but they were made, and have now become so blended with every order of society, in their interest and transactions, that no patriot can refuse to sustain them as long as they conduct their business honestly. I am a disinterested witness. I do not own a dollar of their stock. I do not owe them one cent. I speak of facts as they are, and tell the plain truth. Let me say one word to you who now war against all banks to the knife, and the knife to the hilt—you may produce revulsion and revolution, but, short of that, you cannot change the order of society.

I desire to say one word to my colleague (Mr. COOPER) on the subject of banks. May I ask him what is the difference, in principle, of supporting banks and owning them? or, in other words, how can he consistently oppose all banks with such vehemence, and still be the owner of one himself? Is it right, in principle or morality, to oppose a bank whose interest is regulated by law at six per cent., and still be the owner of a bank authorized by law to take the highest rate of interest it can get? The one is regulated by law; the other has no bounds but what are set by avarice and necessity.

I am happy to see my colleague in such good company. Our Senator (Mr. LUMPKIN) whispers him closely. How softly he talks to my friend! How these gentlemen do nurse their infant Democrats! Well, well, this looks strange to me! And, but the other day, when my colleague (Mr. COLQUITT) was about to speak to this question, I saw the old gentleman talking softly in his ear. Heavens! how these old folks do nurse their baby Democrats! It must be painful to memory!

Mr. Chairman, I now approach the last branch of this debate, and by far the most important. I will say a word on the effect of this measure upon the Government of the country and the liberty of the people. What it has done, is easily understood; what it will do, cannot be comprehended or foretold in all its direful effects. The President of the United States began this system by seizing upon the purse of the people, in violation of law. He usurped the power of Congress, and claimed it for himself. He removed the deposites. He arrested the power of legislation from the Representatives of the people, and exercised it himself in a tyrannical and unlawful manner. He displaced an honest officer, and appointed one subservient to his ambition. And his successor, who promises to tread in his footsteps, is now asking us to confirm in his hands the power thus obtained by usurpation and aggression; or, in other words, to give him the purse and the sword. He desires to wear the uniform of Andrew Jackson, and control the people's Treasury. He will look odd—a mock tyrant—a Kinderhook hero—a monkey treading in the footsteps of a giant! The uniform will not fit; the character will not suit; but still the injury will be the same. All power is concentrated in the head of the nation.

This measure will soon become a law; and the President has the sword and the purse. All he lacks is an army, to kill those he cannot buy; and he now boldly demands a standing army of two hundred thousand men. Give him that, also, (as you will at last, I fear,) and in his person is concentrated all the powers of this nation, which rightfully belong to her people; and he is emphatically a monarch, and under his reign we shall be slaves, if he should be re-elected. The people are impoverished; they groan under a mountain-weight of debt. Commerce does not afford a revenue. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means dare not tell the amount of our revenue; it is almost nothing. We are actually receiving comparatively nothing from duties on imports, notwithstanding we have a tariff of duties now much too high. What is the cause of this poverty? Your sub-Treasury, your golden dreams, your iron times, your hard-money currency, have killed commerce, broken the merchant, ruined the planter, and turned the mechanic out of employment. All this has come already from the anticipated operation of this accursed experiment.

One more measure will result from this scheme—direct taxes. Your coffers must be filled. You had as well appoint your assessors and collectors of taxes at once, and go and demand gold and silver of the people to glut your avarice. Georgia has no strong box provided for our State. We must pay our taxes into Mr Calhoun's department, and thus be made tributary to South Carolina. There is no justice, equality, honesty, or benefit in the whole device. It is an engine of power and oppression—a great political inquisition, to crush the people and the laws. When the power of this corrupt Administration moves the lever and turns the screw, the body politic will be broken on the wheel, and the life's blood of this nation will flow under its tortures. Let us wake up to our danger in time to defeat the election of the chief and author of this fatal device. Let us defeat him, and break the succession, or we shall be enslaved to others more vicious and tyrannical than he is himself. We can achieve it if we will. We have the means in our own hands. The privilege of voting is still allowed us. Let us elect WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, and all will be right again; this scheme to ruin us will be dissolved; confidence will be restored; and peace, good order, and prosperity will return to our borders.

SPEECH OF MR. MERRICK,

OF MARYLAND,

In Senate, January 23, 1840.—On the Sub-Treasury Bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, having concluded his remarks in opposition to the bill—

Mr. MERRICK rose and said, he had understood the Senator from Ohio (Mr. TAPPAN) to say that if the debate was to progress further, he wished to have an opportunity of delivering his opinions; and Mr. M.'s object in rising, therefore, was to say to the Senator that he (Mr. M.) also desired, and intended, to express his views before the vote was taken, but would with pleasure give way, and allow the Senator from Ohio to precede him, if such was his wish.

Mr. TAPPAN declining to address the Senate at all on the subject, Mr. MERRICK proceeded to say that he felt it to be imperatively his duty to submit his views upon a question of such great moment, and so vitally interesting to his own immediate constituents, as well as to the whole country, advocated, as it had now been, upon grounds more extraordinary and more unjustifiable than any he had ever heard in this country. But as it was then late in the evening, (past five o'clock,) and the Senate must be already wearied by so protracted a sitting, he would move that the Senate do now adjourn. He should not have made this motion, late as the hour was, but that he desired an opportunity to look into and examine a large bundle of papers which he held in his hand, and which had been some time since communicated to the Senate by the Executive, in relation to the particular subject then under consideration, and for the examination of which no opportunity had yet been afforded to the members of the Senate generally. It would be recollected, he said, that those papers had been, when first presented to the Senate, referred to the Committee on Finance; that committee had ever since retained possession of those papers, (he did not doubt from correct motives,) without causing them in the usual way to be printed for the use of the Senate. He had the day before applied to the chairman of that committee for the privilege of examining them, and his request was promptly acceded to; but it so happened that the Senate remained in session till a late hour that evening, and the papers not being exactly in place at the time of adjournment, he could not then get them; nor had he been able to see them at all until after the commencement of the session this morning, when the honorable chairman, (Mr. WRIGHT,) with his characteristic politeness and courtesy, handed them to him in his place in the Senate. It was obvious to all that there had been no opportunity since to give them the slightest examination.*

The motion to adjourn being refused by a vote of the majority, Mr. MERRICK again rose, and said he had always been reluctant to trespass upon the time and attention of the Senate; and he had felt a more than usual degree of reluctance to trouble the body with any remarks of his this evening, because the lateness of the hour and the wearied condition of the members, to say nothing of his inability to command attention under the most favorable circumstances, rendered it but too manifest that he should be addressing unwilling hearers. He had, too, really desired to examine the documents communicated by the Executive on this very subject, before he submitted his views upon it; which documents, as he had stated on moving for the adjournment, had, when first delivered to the Senate, been referred to the Committee on Finance, had ever since been retained by that committee without being printed, or any opportunity afforded to Senators to examine them, and of which, although he had before endeavored, he had not been able to get possession until after the commencement of the debate this morning, and then only through the courtesy of the honorable chairman. These papers might or might not contain information material, and important to be known and considered before the final decision of the question. He was himself unable to say what they contained; but it was fair to presume, as the Government had been at great pains to collect and communicate them to the Senate, that they contained something useful in illustration of the operation of the principles of the bill under discussion; and he would not assume, though the refusal of an opportunity to examine them afforded room for such a suspicion, that they might contain something which some of the ardent friends of the pending measure were unwilling to submit to private scrutiny or public view. Since, however, the majority of the Senate had seen fit to refuse him the indulgence, at all times promptly extended when asked for, with or without reason, to members on the other side, and within the last two days accorded to the Senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) at an unusually early hour, he would without scruple or apology of any kind proceed to exercise his right to express distinctly and fully his opinions upon this most unwise and pernicious measure, whether those opinions might be agreeable to gentlemen or not. He was fully determined that this attempt to smother debate should not be successful, so far as depended upon him at least. He had some rights there, as well as the majority; they had the power to refuse an adjournment, although the day was spent, and thus endeavor to preclude not only an examination of the documents he had referred to, but all further discussion of the bill. But he must tell gentlemen he had the power and the right to proceed in the discussion, and that right he was resolved to exercise. He knew full well it was useless to address reasons or arguments of any kind in opposition to this measure to the majority of the Senate; they had determined to pass the bill, and would hearken to nothing that could be said, however demonstrative of its evil tendency. But there was yet a higher tribunal, having the most direct, deep, and abiding interest in this and all other measures passed upon here, to whom it was not useless to speak—he meant the freemen of this glorious Republic. They will inquire into, judge, and determine upon the merits and demerits of this and all other propositions entertained by this body, and their determination will be according to the right and truth of the matter, in spite of all the efforts which may be here made to the contrary. They, sir, will hold both majorities and minorities here to a just and strict accountability. Before them, at least, I wish to stand justified for the vote I am now about to give; and to them (since all further argument is manifestly lost upon this Senate) I wish to be understood as now addressing myself. No, sir, I am speaking too fast; I am too humble an individual, too little known to fame, to expect that my remarks will be considered or attended to by the whole, or any very large portion of the whole American people; but there is a small portion—a high-spirited, enlightened, and patriotic portion of those people, who will read and consider what I have to say—my own constituents. The people of Maryland have a right to know and judge of the reasons for the manner in which I exercise the high powers they have deputed me to exercise here; and I shall now give them the reasons for my vote upon this bill, in the best manner I can, forced, as I am, by the majority of this body, to proceed instantly, all unprepared as I am for the discussion, or not at all.

This debate, Mr. President, is, from the nature of the question involved, and the multifarious interests mediately and immediately to be affected by the adoption of the proposed policy, capable of being made to take a most comprehensive range; but it shall be my study to abridge as much as possible, passing entirely much that has been better said by abler men, and glancing only at some few of the most prominent objections which present themselves to my judgment, desiring to consume no more time than is necessary to state them plainly and distinctly.

And now what is the proposition before us? The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) said the other day, in the argument he addressed to us on the subject, that it was the most simple thing imaginable. It is nothing more, said the honorable gentleman, "than to deposite for safekeeping the public money with officers responsible to the Government, instead of depositing it with irresponsible corporations." How very, very simple! how harmless! how innocent and unimportant the honorable Senator would make it appear! And yet, with all this insignificance and simplicity, it has unceasingly agitated the whole country for three years; and the united energies of the great and powerful party of which the gentleman is a most conspicuous member, though exerted throughout that whole period with unwearied perseverence, have not yet proved sufficient to force it upon a reluctant people. It is something more, then, than the harmless, simple, insignificant thing the gentleman represents it to be; and would be much more correctly characterized by striking out the whole description the gentleman has given of it, as well as the title now annexed to the bill, and inserting the following as its true title, viz: A bill to separate, as far as possible, the interests of the Government and Government officers from the interests of the people, and to reduce the value of property, and the wages of labor, in the United States. This, sir, is certainly much more expressive of the true nature and effects of the measure, than either the description given of it by the gentleman or the title it now bears. Let us examine it. The Senator says it is to deposite the public money for safekeeping with officers responsible to the Government, instead of irresponsible corporations. How are these officers more responsible to the Government than sound, solvent, and well-regulated banks? If that sort of responsibility which results from being the mere creatures of the President, holding their offices at his will, and subservient, from that very tenure, in all things, both in keeping and disposing of the people's money, to his pleasure, be the kind of responsibility to which the gentleman alludes, and which the friends of this bill desire to establish, I grant you it will be obtained by this measure; but if by responsibility is meant security for the money—assurance that it will be applied only according to the will and wishes of the people themselves, as declared by their Representatives—guaranty against defaults and embezzlement—I take issue with the gentleman, and deny that any one of these desirable and important ends will or can be as well attained by this measure as they have been, and can be again, by the modes of keeping the public money heretofore most commonly practised by this Government. If there be any one bold enough to maintain that any amount of money will be safer in the hands of any of the individual receivers and keepers contemplated by this bill, especially if the amount which comes to his hands is fluctuating and liable occasionally to be large, much larger, as it often must be, than the real security afforded by any bond you can, in the nature of things, exact or obtain from any of them, and when, therefore, your sole dependance for safety is upon the honesty of the individual, than the same amount of money would be in a sound and solvent bank of large capital, where, in addition to the character and honesty of the officers of the bank, and the mutual check and guard each one of these is upon another, you have as real, solid, substantial security for your deposites, the whole capital property, and profits of the bank—I can only say, with such a one no argument can be maintained; for the same disregard of the natural relation of things would induce a denial of the simplest addition of numbers, or the most palpable connexions of cause and effect. He might deny that two and two make four, or that the sun gives light in the heavens; no one could prove it to him by argument, nor would any one doubt such palpable truths because of his denial. Then this claim for any greater responsibility for the public money, which it is asserted this bill will afford, falls to the ground; and there remain to recommend it to the favor of the American people, and justify its passage, only those incidental consequences, many of them heretofore, and some, not the least important of them, now, for the first time, avowed and declared to be desired and expected from it. And what are they? First, it is to discountenance, check, and reduce, if not totally to destroy, the credit system; not the credit system of the Government, for there is none such, except the credit given upon duties on imports, and the credit taken by the issue of Treasury notes, neither of which has been objected to or proposed to be altered by any gentleman on the other side in my hearing; but the system of doing business and carrying on their exchanges upon credit, in use among the people. And again, it is, by its express provisions, to require, after a very short period, the payment of all taxes and dues to the Government in gold and silver coin only, and consequentially to bring the whole country down to a pure metallic currency. Let us try these supposed good effects by what, to my judgment, are the only legitimate tests of the goodness of the effects of any political measure; let us inquire whether they are such as will produce the greatest amount of good to the greatest number of free people; let us examine and determine whether they are to be beneficial to the many or the few; and if found, upon this examination, to be injurious to the great body of the people, and beneficial only to the few, and yielding that benefit, too, at the direct and immediate and heavy cost of the greater number, let us, as true Republicans, anxious to administer the Government in conformity to the great principles of equality which gave being to our institutions, reject and repudiate both the cause and the effect, the bill and these consequences. It is admitted, for it cannot be denied, that there exists in the country at this time general and wide-spread embarrassment and distress. It is admitted, too, that this arises from a general indebtedness of the larger portion of society, in greater or less degrees, occasioned by the want of their usual and appropriate employments among the laborious, industrious, and enterprising classes, and the utter inability of the great body of the people to obtain, by the sale of either their property or the products of their industry, the necessary means to meet and pay promptly their various pecuniary engagements. I say nothing about the causes which produced this state of things; it boots not now to charge that home upon hands which, having dealt the blow, have also passed off the public stage. My business is with the facts as they are, and I leave it to the secret recess of every man's own bosom to tell him if I have not stated truly his own or his neighbor's situation. A remedy proposed, as one of the effects to flow from this bill, is, a great reduction or total destruction of credit. That is, to require all debtors to forego any further indulgence upon the demands against them, and promptly to come forward, raise the money, and pay off their obligations at whatever sacrifice; and to take care, in the mean time, that no other debts, not even temporary and for necessaries, be contracted. Who are benefited by this—the debtors or the creditors? Let the debtor part of society answer for themselves. Which constitute the greater number—the debtors or the creditors? All know the many are the debtors, and those who owe no debts the few and the very wealthy. Now couple with this the other branch of the proposition, that gold and silver coin only is to be used as a circulating medium; and who can contemplate the consequences to the great body of the people, the debtor portion, without shrinking appalled by the spectacle it presents? At the very moment when a prompt settlement of all debts is demanded and insisted upon, you annihilate and strike from existence as money more than half the currency of the country. Down must go the value of property of all kinds to the lowest imaginable limits, because few, very few, can have money to buy with; and the earnings o

* This bundle of papers consisted of statements furnished, agreeably to directions, by various consuls and other agents of the Government of the United States, in a number of foreign countries, mostly European, showing the fiscal policy, mode of collecting, keeping, and disbursing the public moneys in those countries respectively, and the media in which their several public dues were collected.

the whole past lives of the industrious and enterprising farmers, mechanics, and all others who have remnants of debt hanging over them, must be sacrificed to pay those remnants of debt. Many a man and many a worthy family, now possessed of comfortable homes, and believing themselves independent in the possession of the fruits of by-gone years of honest industry, will find themselves stripped of every thing, and driven forth from those homes and that independence, to begin the world anew, and toil daily for a mere subsistence. Who will acquire the property thus forced into the market, and sold at any sacrifice? Who but your money-kings, your wealthy capitalists, your men with their tens of thousands of dollars of hoarded gold and silver? They may acquire any amount of property they please. They may become princes in wealth; whilst the many, the great mass, are beggared and ruined. The few will be enabled to appropriate to any extent they please, to their own exclusive use and benefit and enjoyment, the fruits of the industry and toil of the many; and in no way are the many possibly to derive any even seeming equivalent; unless, indeed, there be some among them simple enough to esteem the delight which the glitter and jingle of the pittance of gold and silver which they receive for their sacrificed property (during the short period it remains with them in passing from the purchasers of their homes and their all to the hands of their creditors) as an equivalent for their losses. You require the prompt payment of all debts, and, at the same instant you require this, you double the difficulty of paying them. You disregard the implied, though known and well understood, reference had by all persons in debt to the relative values of money and property and labor as they existed at the time of contracting those debts; and you practise upon them the cruel injustice of reducing by one-half the money value of all they have to pay with, and doubling at the same time the value of the money to be paid to their creditors. You beggar those in debt, and greatly enrich those to whom debts are due. You are adopting a policy which must tend to "make the rich richer, and the poor poorer." In no light in which I can view it, can I perceive any thing but injury and evil to flow from it to the many; its benefits will inure exclusively to the salaried officers and to moneyed capitalist, at the direct and heavy cost of the great mass of the citizens of the country. It cannot abide the test by which I have proposed to try it; it will not work by the good old republican rule of equal justice to all, and preferences for none. It has not, therefore, heretofore had, and can never have, my vote or sanction. Again, it has been gravely urged by several of the prominent supporters of this measure, as one of its most salutary effects, that it will reduce the wages of labor in this country, and bring them down to what gentlemen are pleased to call the specie standard; that is, to the rates paid for wages to the laboring portions of the people in those countries where credit is very limited, and hard money is the only currency or circulating medium. And it is argued that the high prices paid for wages in this country are the great cause of all the distress which so extensively prevails. We are further told, with a seeming air of triumph, to contemplate the advantages which several European countries enjoy over us, especially in manufacturing enterprises, by the low rates at which labor is to be hired there; wages being lower in several of those countries, in proportion as there is credit, and they approach nearer to an exclusively metallic currency. Mr. President, this is an argument I never expected to hear in an American Senate. I did not think there was any man or any party bold enough to advance it in a republican country. And although I have long known and often contended that a great and ruinous reduction in the wages of labor was to be the inevitable consequence of any attempt to bring this country down to a merely gold and silver currency, I had hoped there was no one who would advocate the policy with such a view. I have often, in thinking of the consequences of the adoption of the policy proposed by this bill, of its many evil and pernicious consequences to the people of this country, contemplated the miserable, dependent, servile, and wretched condition of the working classes, in those countries where a similar policy prevailed; and have shuddered to think a like distress, misery, and dependence might be brought upon that most numerous and valuable portion of my own fellow-citizens, if it became the law of this land. But till now I always supposed the advocates of the bill, blinded by party zeal, or deceived by their prejudices against banks, foresaw not this effect from it, and could not desire so to paralyze and cripple and blight the prospects of the working people of the country. I did not—I could not have believed that the worship, the idolatrous worship of gold and silver, could ever so far get possession of the hearts and minds of men in this land of liberty and intelligence, as to render them willing to forego the delight which must gladden all rightly constituted minds when they see around them, in every direction, among their fellow-citizens, joyous industry and smiling plenty and independence, and to offer these all up a sacrifice to the glitter and jingle of a few pieces of base coin. I had always known and believed that an abundant circulating medium, plenty without superabundance of money, was the great stimulus to industry and enterprise of all kinds; promotive of moral and intellectual improvement, and productive of both national and individual happiness and prosperity. Credit I had always considered, and still consider, the great lever by which the industrious, enterprising, and intelligent portion of the people may raise themselves from the humblest to the highest conditions in life; and I have often rejoiced in my heart that the nature and genius of our laws and institutions, and the habits of our country, afforded such a means for our young and active and intelligent men, who might have no capital but their personal energies and honest names to procure the facilities and means of carrying on, upon their own accounts, any branch of business—mechanical, agricultural, or any other; thus opening to them a ready access, by industry and perseverance, to independence and respectability; and so insuring, as an almost certain reward for well-spent seasons of youth and manhood, that great good, from all hope of which those born in a similarly humble condition in the older non credit-using, hard money countries of Europe were and are forever cut off. I have ever rejoiced, and still rejoice, when I see an independent, spirited, bold, and honest laborer of this country going forth to toil, with all that self-confidence, energy, and cheerfulness, so naturally and constantly inspired by the consciousness that his day's labor is to earn for him enough to give abundance and comfort to himself and his family, and leave, besides, something to add to the capital he is endeavoring to accumulate for the independence of his advanced years. What American does not, who can fail to, rejoice at the contemplaton of the rapid advances made by our country in all the arts of civilization and improvement? And who can deny that these have been the result of the facilities afforded by credit, and the liberal rewards of labor, acting upon and stimulating to exertion the ingenuity and industry of the great body of the people? Where has intellectual and moral improvement been greater amongst any people on the face of the earth than among the inhabitants of this country? Where are greater, or as great, results produced by the physical and intellectual energies of the same amount of population, as in these United States? And why is it that we have so far outstripped the inhabitants of your hard money countries? Why but because here every one has labored with the certain prospect of bettering his condition, and this bright and captivating prospect has animated the bosoms of our laboring people, and stimulated them to the utmost exertion of their every faculty; developed by constant attrition the high mental powers of all; and so produced, and is still producing, daily additions to the stock of human knowledge, and enlarging the sphere of human happiness and enjoyment. Cut off this prospect; deaden this animating hope; let your working classes understand and know that, struggle as they may, they are never to rise, any of them, above their present humble condition—and what is there left to them worth struggling for? Necessity will compel them to work for a subsistence; but where will be their present ardor—where their spirit of improvement—where their ever-sharpening, ever-brightening intelligence? Dead, perished and gone, with the bright hopes which now stimulate and awaken them. They may perform the amount of labor imposed upon them by necessity; but it will, it must be coldly and reluctantly done, without care as to manner or effect, and without the co-operation of the mind. Systems of policy may be adopted by Government, and do exist in your hard money Governments, which enslave the bodies of the mass of the people, and reduce and keep them in the condition of serfs and villeins; but mind, intelligence, cannot be enslaved and made to drudge for a master! There is something in this essence which will not endure servitude, and cannot be made to act except by its own free impulses. If the body to which it belongs, and to govern and direct which is its office, is enslaved, it must dwindle and perish by the irresistible laws of its nature. So we see in the whole history of the world, the freer the institutions of every people, the greater the developments of intellectual powers amongst them, and the greater, consequently, the sum of their happiness and prosperity. And, on the contrary, the more the many are brought into subjection and subserviency to the few, the lower any people fall in the scale of being, and the less the sum of their enjoyment of the many blessings vouchsafed by the Creator to his creatures. It matters not how this subjection is brought about, whether by the strong arm of power directly exerted, or by covert and indirect governmental policy, The fatal effects will be the same.

But it has been argued that this reduction of the wages of labor is necessary to give protection to our manufacturers, and enable them to compete in the sale of their manufactures with those countries where wages are so very low. This position I cannot admit; and, even were it sound, I would not consent to adopt a polic which should reduce our laboring population to the miserable condition of the peasantry and serfs of Europe for such a purpose. But, sir, the position is unsound in itself, as the scope of a part of what I have already said tends to show. In the successful prosecution of the manufacturing and mechanic arts, you want something more than mere animal power—you want mind; you require skill and ingenuity as well as industry and economy. To obtain these in the highest degree of perfection, there must exist such a system of policy as is best calculated to call forth and elicit these powers and qualities. And that, as I have before said, is a system of liberal wages, liberal rewards for the exertion of such powers, animating and cheering on the operative always to the exertion of all his powers, physical and mental, with the bright hope of elevating himself amongst his fellow-men. Let this description of men, too, as their characters become established, and their skill and ingenuity and practical knowledge are increased, be able to command, by a prudent use of credit, the means of owning and conducting, themselves and upon their own account, the different sorts of manufacturing establishments, and rely upon it they will greatly more than make up in skill, in economy, in persevering industry, and inventive ingenuity, for any difference in the cost of mere labor. Dr. Franklin has said,

> "He that by the plough would thrive,
> Himself must either hold or drive."

And the remark was wise and just, not only in reference to agriculture, but to all other branches of human industry. Oppress your labor; bring the prices paid for manufacturing skill and industry down to the rates paid in your hard money countries; destroy, at the same time, the credit system, and thereby preclude all but your great capitalists from conducting the business, and participating in its profits, and you extinguish the life-giving principle of your success. Your great capitalist will sit upon his bags of gold, doling out with niggard hand his pence to men every way his superiors, for their daily labor. His manufacturing establishments must be conducted by agents whom he will seek to oppress, and who will seek to cheat him in turn. And there will be nowhere acting, to any extent, any stimulus to, or efforts at, improvement; and the great mass of operatives, many of whom might, under a different policy, become useful and valuable to their country, will sink into sullen indifference and despondence. If an illustration of this is wanting, look to England, and contrast her with the countries on the continent of Europe. How far has she outstripped them in all the multifarious branches of human industry? And why has she done so, but because of the greater developments of the mental as well as physical powers of her people, in consequence of the greater freedom of her institutions, the free use of credit, and abundant circulating medium? How very far has she got the start of your non-credit-using, hard-money Governments of the continent? But, far as she has the start of them, the American people are destined, unless crushed by unwise legislation, to get the lead of her equally far, by the time they shall have passed from their state of adolescence as a nation; because our people are so much freer than hers, and our country possesses so many and such incomparably greater advantages of all kinds, than that.

Labor is higher in England than in the hard-money countries of the continent; yet she competes with and triumphs over all of them in the markets of the world! But the wages of labor are low enough there, in all conscience, though much higher there than on the continent of Europe. Mr. President, as it has been urged in support of this bill that one of its good effects will be to reduce the wages of labor in this country—mechanical, manufacturing, agricultural, and all others, of course—I have considered it material and important to inquire to what extent this reduction was to take place. These wages, we are told, must come down to the specie standard; and we have been referred to Germany and Holland, and other European countries, as examples of hard money currencies, and the cheapening effects of such currencies upon wages. Now, sir, as I wish the people to be informed on this subject, as well as ourselves, I have been at the pains to hunt up some documentary evidence of the rates of wages in those countries, and will read them to the Senate, that the American people may see to what they are to be reduced, and make up their minds whether they are willing to submit to such rates, for the sake merely of a hard-money currency. Here are tables of the rates of wages in those countries, which I will read, taken from "Porter's Progress of the Nation."

"In November, 1833, instructions were sent by the British Secretary of State, Lord Palmerston, to certain British consuls residing abroad, requiring answers to certain questions having reference to the state of agriculture, and to the condition of the agricultural peasantry within the districts of their consulates. Answers received from the consuls in various parts of France, Germany, the Netherlands, and Italy, have lately been presented to Parliament; and from these documents the following abstract is taken:

Now, sir, I am greatly in hopes our people will read and ponder over this table; they will there see that in France yearly wages for an able-bodied man range from 48 to 250 shillings, and day laborers get in that country from 4½ to 15 pence per day; and whenever they get as much as 5 pence, they have to find themselves. In Germany wages are still lower, and range by the year between 52 and 100 shillings, and day laborers receive from 4½ to 7 pence per day, and find themselves in food. In South Holland farm hands get by the year from 200 to 250 shillings, and day laborers from 3 to 4 pence per day, and are found. And so on, sir. Whoever will take the trouble to examine the table, which is official and authentic, will see that, in all these countries, which are held up to us as such bright examples of hard money countries—France, Germany, Netherlands, Italy—wages by the year for an able-bodied, sound, healthy man, nowhere exceed 250 shillings; and, in many instances, fall as low as 40, 50, and 60 shillings; and the daily wages range from 3 to 9 and 12 pence—rising in one place, and only one, to 20 pence, and the laborer finding himself! What a commentary upon the hard-money policy! What hope is here for a man born the son of poor parents ever to better his condition? What ray of hope is there to stimulate him to exertion? None, none! He who is there born a peasant, dies a peasant. Those born to the plough die at the plough-tail; and all that the longest life of laborious toil can procure for them is coarse and scanty means of subsistence. Think you, sir, these people are made happy because theirs are hard-money countries? Is this the prosperity boasted of when we are triumphantly told of the immense amounts of gold and silver held by their great capitalists? Is this an example worthy of our imitation? Think you, sir, the high blood of American freemen will submit to this? Never.

The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) in the eloquent speech with which he favored us the other day in support of this bill, exultingly told us the people of the country were for it. He spoke of its former defeat in Congress, and of the triumphs of his party in several of the recent elections, as giving proof that the yeomanry of the land had declared in favor of it, and were commending the wisdom and patriotism of its projectors. Sir, the Senator in his exultation reminded me of a story I once read about a council of mice, which, with his permission, I will tell. There was once a colony of mice, who would have lived very happily but for the annoyance of a mischievous cat, who was very apt to pounce upon and feast herself with some of their dainty flesh, whenever they ventured to go abroad (or expand, as we are now occasionally inconvenienced by expansions of currency.) These mice called a council to consider of and devise the means more effectually to protect their community from the annoyances of the cat. After the assembly was duly organized, and many wise and grave suggestions had been made by different members, to all of which there had appeared some decisive objection, up rose a smart, sharp-witted little mouse, much distinguished for cunning and management, and holding, I suppose, about the same rank in the esteem and regard of his fellows, as is held in our community by a certain little gentleman at the other end of the avenue, designated yesterday by the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) as the little Magician. All eyes were immediately turned upon him, and every ear was attentive to hear his suggestions; for many supposed he never uttered any thing but upon "sober second thought," and all knew his skill at contrivances. Pleasure was beaming in his countenance, and confidence sat upon his brow, as he announced that he had discovered a remedy for the evils they suffered, which was both simple and effectual; so simple, that the wonder was it had never been thought of before; for it seemed to be pointed out by their very constitution and the nature of things. It was, that they should resolve and decree that this infamous cat should ever thereafter wear a bell about her neck; which, being so worn, must of necessity give the alarm whenever she attempted to move or approach their dominions, and thus afford every one full opportunity to provide for his safety by a timely retreat. The suggestion struck the whole assembly with great force; they burst forth in rapturous applauses of the talents, patriotism, and profound wisdom of the little author; and it was promptly proposed to pass a unanimous vote of thanks in his favor. Just before this vote was taken, however, an old mouse, long retired from the cares of state, but experienced in the wars with grimalkin, observed, with great diffidence, that notwithstanding the remedy proposed seemed to be very efficacious, and possibly would afford to the community (after it should be applied) complete protection, yet there appeared to him to be a small difficulty in applying it, namely, the risk of being devoured by the cat while they were fixing the bell upon her; and he could not consent to pass the vote of thanks as proposed, unless the member would also show how this difficulty was to be surmounted. The little gentleman was struck dumb by these remarks; and refusing to attempt to put the bell on himself, upon the ground that he was a counsellor and not an operative, the assembly forthwith, far from passing the vote of thanks, expelled him from the council, and denounced him as unworthy not only of confidence and respect, but deserving of universal execration, for recommending a measure pregnant with imminent peril and mischief in its execution to his fellow citizens generally, and from the evils of which he screened himself by virtue of his station. Such, sir, will be the reverse of fortune with the authors of this measure. They had the confidence of the country. The measure has seemed to find favor with the people, and gentlemen may now flatter themselves with some indications given in the late elections of the passage of a vote of thanks by the people in their favor. But when you attempt to bell the cat; when the people shall see and feel that they are to be crushed and destroyed by the execution of your plan; when they find themselves impoverished, the prices of all kinds of property and products of industry reduced to almost nothing, and realize in practice the very, very low prices of labor, as I have shown them to be in the non-credit-using, hard money countries; and see, too, that from all these evils the authors of the measure are themselves protected by being salaried officers, with salaries payable in gold and silver; they will not only refuse the vote of thanks you now hope for, but I am much mistaken if they do not visit upon authors, aiders, and abettors of the whole scheme such decisive marks of displeasure as will cause them bitterly to repent that it was ever suggested.

Sir, the body of the people of this country have been much amused, for some years past, with the praises of hard money, and eulogies upon the condition of those countries where coin is the exclusive circulating medium; and they have been seduced into the opinion, especially the laboring people, that they were to receive, if the policy of the measure now under consideration were carried out, the same amount in payment for their labor or productions, in silver and gold, as they have usually received in convertible bank notes. But they have not yet considered or understood that they were to receive, in place of one dollar or more per day for their wages, but four pence or nine pence in coin. They have not reflected upon the immense tax this change was to levy upon the productive industry of the country, for the sole and exclusive benefit of the money-holders and salaried officers! Are gentlemen blind enough to imagine they can persuade any considerable part of the intelligent people of America to believe that when one of them has a five dollar bank bill in his pocket, received as wages for as many days' work, which bill he knows he can convert into silver or gold if he pleases, and which, whether converted or not, will purchase for him an equal amount of any thing his wants or convenience may require, that it would be better for him to have received for his same five days' work some twenty, thirty, forty, or even one hundred pence in coin? It is possible such opinions may obtain amongst those who wish to acquire money for the purpose of hoarding merely, and whose greatest delight consists in counting and turning over bits of coin; but they will never be entertained by those who know the real value and appropriate uses of money; who desire to earn and acquire it only for the purpose of paying their debts, or of exchanging it for those things which contribute really to the comfort, happiness, and well-being of themselves or of those that are dear to them. What difference does it make to a man who owes five or a hundred dollars, whether he pays his debt with a bank note or with gold and silver? None. But it makes a vast difference to him if forced to pay in gold and silver only; and he is obliged, in consequence, to give five or six times the amount of labor or property to procure this gold and silver.

But, it is urged this change is necessary; this reduction of prices here is required to enable our manufacturers to compete with those of Europe, and thereby prevent the balance of trade against us, which is periodically draining our country of the precious metals, and causing suspensions of specie payments and the like. In my humble judgment, sir, the unfavorable balance of trade against us is to be attributed to another and a very different cause. It is properly and justly assignable to our unwise commercial regulations. It is because we permit European countries to supply our markets with their surplus productions, whilst they exclude many of ours from their markets. We import cotton goods, broadcloths, and other productions of British industry, and wines and silks, and other articles, from France, to an immense amount, at a very moderate and now constantly decreasing rate of duty, and, in fact, to a great extent, duty free, whilst the productions of our soil and industry, which the people of those countries would gladly receive in payment, are excluded from their markets altogether, or are so burdened with excessive duties, that their value goes to enrich the treasuries of those Governments, instead of the American producer. American cotton they do receive; but why? Because it is a necessary raw material in their manufacturing establishments, which they cannot produce themselves, and because tney can send back to you, in its manufactured state, a small portion in payment for the whole. Cotton has become a necessary, for which they are dependent upon us; but you receive from them articles of luxury. We are, or easily might be, dependent upon them for no necessary whatever. How do they treat our great staples of flour and tobacco, &c.? Our flour is never admitted, unless famine is threatening, but at a rate of duty which amounts to prohibition. And our tobacco pays into the treasury of England about five or six times the price at which it is sold by the American producer, before it can enter the English market; and from France it is altogether excluded, except in very limited quantities, and these only at such rates as the Government pleases to allow, without regard to the price it would command from those very people whose silks and wines we receive without duty, and for which it would be but just that we should have the privilege of exchanging it upon equal terms.

We buy the productions of English and French industry, and we pay to the Governments of those countries respectively, (such of us at least as produce grain and tobacco,) from one-half to four-fifths of the products of our industry for the privilege of paying their people with the remainder. This is the way in which what is now called your free-trade system operates. The freedom is all given by us, and none received in return. The freedom is to the foreign country to tax our people in their productions as much as they please, while they are free to compete with us in our own markets with their productions untaxed. Such a system must forever keep the balance of trade against us; must keep us always in debt, and liable to be drained of our stock of coin by the countries from which we buy. Give us freedom of trade in fact; let there be perfect freedom on both sides for the exchange of surplus commodities, without duties and taxes; or, if these be necessary, let there be an equally balanced system of duties on both sides. Let the American producer of flour and tobacco, or any thing else, be free to exchange it with the producer of French silk or English cloth, for such price as the English or French manufacturer is himself willing to pay for it, Government charges on both sides being equal in proportion to the market value of the things exchanged, and there will be no fear of heavy balances against us, payable in coin, nor any necessity for a resort to sub-Treasury bills to introduce specie into this country, or to reduce the wages of American labor. I would buy of those who would buy of us upon fair and equal terms. I would purchase the surplus productions, so far as we have occasion for them, of those countries only which would allow our surplus productions to be sold in their markets upon equal terms. And such Governments as exclude or heavily burden our productions in their markets could not complain of their productions being similarly treated here. But I must pass on.

One of the highest obligations which rests upon this Government, one of the very ends for which it was created, was to protect the people of the Union from the very evils and inconveniences they are now suffering from the disordered state of their circulating medium. Hence the power given to it in terms by the Constitution, "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures." The design of this grant was, that there should be secured for the whole people a uniform measure of value, as well as uniform measures of quantities; this uniformity in the measure of value in different parts of the country being even more essential to fair dealing between those parts than uniformity in the measures of quantity. It certainly was not, as some contend, the design of this clause of the Constitution that there should be nothing used as currency but gold and silver, for you are not even confined to those metals in making coin; but it was designed for most beneficial purposes, to vest in the Government power to regulate the value of money; and, consequently, it was imposed upon it as a duty to take care that the country be protected from the evils attendant upon irregularly depreciated and fluctuating bank paper, or whatsoever else was or should become the actual circulating currency of the country. You propose, by the measure under consideration, not to regulate the actual currency, but to destroy it. By this attempt you may impair greatly its utility, you may produce much more inequality than now exists, but you cannot totally destroy it. Much evil, great suffering, and injustice may be produced by this effort to bring the country to a purely metallic currency; but the end cannot be accomplished. It is inconsistent with the nature and genius of our institutions—inconsistent with the habits and customs of our people—inconsistent with the spirit of the age—and no less inconsistent with the interests, prosperity, and happiness of this community, and cannot and ought not to be effected. Meantime you neglect the performance of this high duty; you aggravate the very evils which you, and you only, have power to remedy; and throwing this duty from you, as if with scorn, the people are told to "take care of themselves, and that Government will take care of itself." By this culpable neglect, in addition to the many other evils you leave the community exposed to, you reduce and render most precarious and uncertain the rewards of industry of all kinds. Multitudes will be thrown out of employment; idleness, dissipation, and vice will increase; and as, in the nature of human affairs, descent is always more facile that ascent, many years will be required to restore the body politic to the condition it would be in but for the folly and negligence of this Government. As illustrative of the bad effects of this irregularity and uncertainty of employment, and the contrary good effects of a policy which shall produce the opposite results, I will quote the following observations from the author to whose labors I am indebted for the rates of wages in several European countries, as before given. On page 249 of this interesting book he says:

"The following facts, which are given upon the authority of a gentleman who has had the chief practical direction of an extensive work, will serve to confirm the position here advanced, and will show how paramount a duty it is for those whose acts and deliberations must tend to the continuance or removal of so unfavorable a state of things, to give their earnest and most careful thoughts for the introduction of a more certain and stable system:

"The formation of a canal, which has been in progress during the last five years in the north of Ireland, has afforded steady employment to a portion of the peasantry, who, before that time, were suffering all the evils, so common in that country, which result from the precariousness of employment. Such work as they could previously get came at uncertain intervals, and was sought by so many competitors that the remuneration was of the scantiest amount. In this condition of things, the men were improvident to recklessness; their wages, insufficient for the comfortable sustenance of their families, were wasted in procuring for themselves a temporary forgetfulness of their misery at the whiskey-shop; and the men appeared to be sunk into a state of hopeless degradation. From the moment, however, that work was offered to them, which was constant in its nature and certain in its duration, and on which their weekly earnings would be sufficient to provide for their comfortable support, men who had been idle and dissolute were converted into sober, hard-working laborers, and proved themselves kind and careful husbands and fathers; and it is stated as a fact, that, notwithstanding the distribution of several hundred pounds weekly in wages, the whole of which must be considered as so much additional money placed in their hands, the consumption of whiskey was absolutely and permanently diminished in the district. During the comparatively short period this canal has been in progress, some of the most careful laborers, men who most probably, before then, never knew what it was to possess five shillings at any one time, have saved sufficient money to enable them to emigrate to Canada, where they are now laboring in independence for the improvement of their own land."

But, Mr. President, this bill is to pass. The decree of party has gone forth, and, let what will be said or shown, that decree will be obeyed. Those in power have determined to stake their fortunes upon the hazard of the die, whether weal or wo betide. It is to pass this body, sir, and that speedily; and though much, very much more might be said in opposition to it, knowing the utter hopelessness of any effort to prevent its passage, and having, as I believe, assigned sufficient reasons in justification of the negative vote I intend to give, I will detain you, sir, no longer, but to express my earnest hope that we may not all see cause, ere long, bitterly to repent of this night's work.

MR. WEBSTER'S SPEECH,

In Senate, May 18, 1840, on the proposed amendment to the Bankrupt Bill.

I feel a deep and anxious concern for the success of this bill, and, in rising to address the Senate, my only motive is a sincere desire to answer objections which have been made to it, so far as I may be able, and to urge the necessity and importance of its passage. Fortunately, it is a subject which does not connect itself with any of the party contests of the day; and although it would not become me to admonish others, yet I have prescribed it as a rule to myself, that, in attempting to forward the measure, and to bring it to a successful termination, I shall seek no party ends, no party influence, no party advancement. The subject, so far as I am concerned, shall be sacred from the intrusion of all such objects and purposes. I wish to treat this occasion, and this highly important question, as a green spot, in the midst of the fiery deserts of party strife, on which all may meet harmoniously and amicably, and hold common counsel for the common good.

The power of Congress over the subject of bankruptcies—the most useful mode of exercising the power under the present circumstances of the country—and the duty of exercising it—are the points to which attention is naturally called by every one who addresses the Senate.

In the first place, as to the power. It is fortunately not an inferred or constructive power, but one of the express grants of the Constitution. "Congress shall have power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." These are the words of the grant; there may be questions about the extent of the power, but there can be none of its existence.

The bill which has been reported by the committee provides for voluntary bankruptcies only. It contains no provisions by which creditors, on an alleged act of bankruptcy, may proceed against their debtors, with a view to subject them and their property to the operation of the law. It looks to no coercion by a creditor to make his debtor a subject of the law against his will. This is the first characteristic of the bill, and in this respect it certainly differs from the former bankrupt law of the United States, and from the English bankrupt laws.

The bill, too, extends its provisions not only to those who either in fact or in contemplation of law are traders, but to all persons who declare themselves insolvent, or unable to pay their debts and meet their engagements, and who desire to assign their property for the benefit of their creditors. In this respect, also, it differs from the former law, and from the law of England.

The questions, then, are two: 1st. Can Congress constitutionally pass a bankrupt law which shall include other persons besides traders? 2d. Can it pass a law providing for voluntary cases only; that is, cases in which the proceedings originate only with the debtor himself?

The consideration of both these questions is necessarily involved in the discussion of the present bill, inasmuch as it has been denied that Congress has power to extend bankrupt laws further than to merchants and traders, or to make them for voluntary cases only. This limitation in the power of Congress is asserted on the idea that the framers of the Constitution, in conferring the power of establishing bankrupt laws, must be presumed to have had reference to the bankrupt laws of England, as then existing; and that the laws of England, then existing, embraced none but merchants and traders, and provided only for involuntary or coercive bankruptcies.

Now, sir, in the first place, allow me to remark, that the power is granted to Congress in the most general and comprehensive terms. It has one limitation only—which is, that laws on the subject of bankruptcies shall be uniform throughout the United States. With this qualification, the whole subject is placed in the discretion and under the legislation of Congress. The Constitution does not say that Congress shall have power to pass a bankrupt law, nor to introduce the system of bankruptcy. It declares that Congress shall have power to "establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." This is the whole clause, nor is there any limitation or restriction imposed by any other clause.

What, then, is "the subject of bankruptcies?" or, in other words, what are "bankruptcies?" It is to be remembered that the Constitution grants the powers to Congress by particular or specific enumeration; and, in making this enumeration, it mentions bankruptcies as a head of legislation, or as one of the subjects over which Congress is to possess authority. Bankruptcies are the subject, and the word is most certainly to be taken in its common and popular sense—in that sense in which the people may be supposed to have understood it when they ratified the Constitution. This is the true rule of interpretation. And I may remark, that it is always a little dangerous, in construing the Constitution, to search for the opinions or understanding of members of the Convention in any other sources than the Constitution itself, because the Constitution owes its whole force and authority to its ratification by the people, and the people judged of it by the meaning most apparent on its face. How particular members may have understood its provisions, if it could be ascertained, would not be conclusive. The question would still be, how did the people understand it? And this can be decided only by giving their usual acceptation to all words not evidently used in a technical sense, and by inquiring, in any case, what was the interpretation or exposition presented to the people when the subject was under consideration.

Bankruptcies, in the general use and acceptation of the term, mean no more than failures. A bankruptcy is a fact. It is an occurrence in the life and fortunes of an individual. When a man cannot pay his debts, we say he has become bankrupt, or has failed. Bankruptcy is not merely the condition of a man who is insolvent, and on whom a bankrupt law is already acting. This would be quite too technical an interpretation. According to this, there could never be bankrupt laws; because every law, if this were the meaning, would suppose the existence of a previous law. Whenever a man's means are insufficient to meet his engagements and pay his debts, the fact of bankruptcy has taken place; a case of bankruptcy has arisen, whether there be a law providing for it or not.

There may be bankruptcies, or cases of bankruptcy, where there are no bankrupt laws existing. Or bankrupt laws may exist, which shall extend to some bankruptcies, or some cases of bankruptcy, and not to others. We constantly speak of bankruptcies happening among individuals, without reference to existing laws. Bankruptcies, as facts, or occurrences, or cases, for which Congress is authorized to make provision, are failures. A learned judge has said that a law on the subject of bankruptcies, in the sense of the Constitution, is a law making provision for cases of persons failing to pay their debts. Over the whole subject of these bankruptcies, or these failures, the power of Congress, as it stands on the face of the Constitution, is full and complete.

And now let us see how it is that this broad and general power is, or can be, limited by a supposed reference to the English system. The argument is this: The members of the convention, in conferring this power on Congress, must be supposed to have had reference to the bankrupt laws of England; and the bankrupt laws of England, as then existing, embraced only merchants and traders, and were only applied to debtors at the instance of their creditors; therefore, the inference is said to be, that traders only should be regarded as subjects of any bankrupt law to be passed by Congress, and that no such law should give the debtor himself a right to become bankrupt, at his own request; or, at least, that every such law should give a right to the creditor to proceed against his debtor. But is this the just analogy? Is this the point of view in which a general resemblance of our system and the English system may be supposed to have been contemplated? Clearly not, in my opinion. Let it be admitted that the framers of the Constitution looked to England for a general example; they must be supposed, nevertheless, to have looked to the power of Parliament, and not to the particular mode in which that power had been exercised, or the particular law then actually existing. The true analogy is, as it seems to me, between power and power—the power of Parliament, and the power of Congress; and not between the power of Congress, and any actually existing British statute, which might be, perhaps, in many respects, quite unsuitable to our condition.

The members of the convention did not study the British statutes, nor examine judicial decisions, to ascertain the precise nature of the actually existing system of bankruptcy in England. Still less did the people of the United States trouble themselves with such inquiries. All saw that Parliament possessed and exercised a power of passing bankrupt laws, and of altering and amending them, from time to time, according to its own discretion, and the necessities of the case. This power they intended to confer on Congress, as largely, for aught that appears, as they saw it held by Parliament. The early British statutes were not confined to traders; later statutes were so confined; and more recently, again, changes have been made, which bring in very numerous classes of persons who were not esteemed traders, in England, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. I may add, that bankrupt laws, properly so called, or laws providing for the cessio bonorum, on the continent of Europe, and in Scotland, were never confined to traders; and while the members of the Convention may be supposed to have looked to the example of England, it is by no means improbable that they contemplated also the examples and institutions of other countries. There is no reason to suppose that it was intended to tie up the hands of Congress to the establishment of that particular bankrupt system which existed in England in 1789, and to deny to it all power of future modification and amendment: it would be just as reasonable to say that the United States laws of copy-right, of patents for inventions, and many others, could only be mere transcripts of such British statutes on the same subjects as existed in 1789.

The great object was to authorize Congress to establish a uniform system throughout all the States. No State could of itself establish such a system; it could only establish a system for itself; and the diversities, inconsistencies, and interferences of the several State systems had been subjects of much well-grounded complaint. It was intended to give Congress the power to establish uniformity in this respect; and if the English example was regarded, it was regarded in its general character, of a power in Parliament to pass laws on the subject; to repeal them, and pass others, in its discretion; and to deal with the whole subject, from time to time, as experience or the exigencies of the public should suggest or require. The bankrupt system of England, as it existed in 1789, was not the same which had previously existed, nor the same which afterwards existed, or that which now exists. At first, the system was coercive; and the law a sort of criminal law, extending to all persons, as well as traders. But changes had taken place before 1789, and other changes, and very important changes, have taken place since. The system is now greatly simplified and improved, and it is also made much more extensive as to those whom it embraces. It is hardly too much to say that it is preposterous to contend that we are to refuse to ourselves not only the light of our own experience, and all regard to our own peculiar situation, but that we are also to exclude from our regard and notice all modern English improvements, and confine ourselves to the English bankrupt laws as they existed in 1789. The power of Congress is given in the fullest manner, and by the largest and most comprehensive terms and forms of expression; and it cannot be limited by vague presumptions of a reference to other existing codes, or loose conjectures about the intents of its framers, nowhere expressed or intimated in the instrument itself, or any contemporaneous exposition.

I think, then, that Congress may pass a law which shall include persons not traders, and which shall include voluntary cases only. And I think further, that the amendment proposed by the honorable member from New Jersey is, in effect, exactly against his own argument. I think it admits all that he contends against. In the first place, he admits voluntary bankruptcies; and there were none such in England in 1789. This is clear. And in the next place, he admits any one who will say that he has been concerned in trade; and he maintains, and has asserted, that in this country any body may say that. Any body, then, may come in under the bill. The only difference is, he must come in under a disguise, or in an assumed character. Whatever be his employment, occupation, or pursuits, he must come in as a trader, or as one who has been concerned or engaged in trade. The honorable member attempts a distinction between traders and those who can say that they have been engaged in trade. I cannot see the difference. It is too fine for me. A trader is one concerned in trade, and to be concerned in trade is to be a trader. What is the difference? But if persons may be concerned in trade, and yet not be traders, still such persons were not embraced in the English statutes, which apply to traders by name; and, therefore, the gentleman's bill would embrace persons not within those statutes as they stood in 1789.

The gentleman's real object is, not to confine the bill to traders, but to embrace every body; and yet he deems it necessary for every person applying to state, and to swear, that he has been engaged in trade. This seems to me to be both superfluous and objectionable: superfluous, because, if we have a right to bring in persons under one name, we may bring in the same persons under another name, or by a general description; objectionable, because it requires men to state what may very much resemble a falsehood, and to make oath to it. Suppose a farmer or a mechanic to fail: can he take an oath that he has been engaged in trade? If the objection to bring in others than traders is well founded in the Constitution, surely mere form cannot remove it. Words cannot alter things. The Constitution says nothing about traders. Yet the honorable gentleman's amendment requires all applicants to declare themselves traders; and, if they will but say so, and swear so, it shall be so received, and nobody shall contradict it. In other words, a fiction, not very innocent, shall be allowed to overcome a constitutional objection. The gentleman has been misled by a false analogy. He has adopted an example which does not apply to the case, and which he yet does not follow out. The British statutes are confined to traders; but then they contain a long list of persons who it is declared shall be deemed and taken to be traders within the acts. This list they extend, from time to time; and whenever any one within it becomes a voluntary bankrupt, he avers, in substance, that he is a trader, within the act of Parliament. If it had been necessary (as it is not) to follow this example at all, the gentleman's bill should have declared all persons traders, for the purpose of this act; and then every body could have made the declaration without impropriety, as, in England, the applicant only states that which the law has made true. He declares himself a trader, because the law has already declared that he shall be considered a trader. His conscience, therefore, is protected. He swears only according to the act of Parliament, if he swear at all. But, as the provision stands here, it calls on every one to declare himself a trader, or that he has been engaged in trade, not within the particular meaning or sense of any act of Congress, but in the usual and popular acceptation of the word.

Suppose, sir, a cotton planter, by inevitable misfortune, by fire or flood, or by mortal epidemics among his hands, is ruined in his affairs. Suppose he desires to make a surrender of his property and be discharged from his debts. He will be told, You cannot have the benefit of the law as a cotton-planter; it is made only for traders, or persons engaged in trade. Are you not a trader? No. I am no trader, and was never engaged in trade. I bought my land here, bought my hands from Carolina, have bought stock from Kentucky, and raised cotton and sold it. But I never bought an article to sell again. I am no trader. But you must swear that you have been engaged in trade; you must apply, not as John Jones, Esquire, cotton planter, on the Red river; but as Mr. John Jones, trader, at his store-house at or near the plantation of John Jones, Esq. And so, sir, John Jones, the cotton-planter, must either remain as he is, excluded from the provisions of the law altogether, or sneak into them under a disingenuous disguise, if it be not something worse.

This attempt, therefore, sir, to avoid a supposed difficulty, encounters two decisive objections. In the first place, there is no difficulty to be avoided; in the second place, if there was, this manner of avoiding it would be mere evasion.

But now, sir, I come to a very important inquiry. The Constitution requires us to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy, if we establish any. Now what is the uniformity, or in what is it to consist? The honorable gentleman says that the meaning is that the law must give a coercive power to creditors, as well as a voluntary power to debtors; that this is the constitutional uniformity. I deny this altogether. No idea of uniformity arises from any such consideration. The uniformity which the Constitution requires is merely a uniformity throughout all the States. It is a local uniformity, and nothing more. The words are perfectly plain, and the sense cannot be doubted. The authority is, to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States. Can any thing be clearer? To be uniform, is to have one shape, one fashion, one form; and our bankrupt laws, if we pass them, are to have one shape, one fashion, and one form, in every State. If this be not so, what is the sense of the concluding words of the clause, "throughout the United States?" My honorable friend from Kentucky (Mr. CRITTENDEN) has disposed of this whole question, if there ever could be a question about it, by asking the honorable gentleman from New Jersey what uniform means in the very same clause of the Constitution, where the word is applied to rules of naturalization; and what it means in a previous clause, where it declares that all duties of impost shall be uniform throughout the United States.

It can hardly be necessary to discuss this point further. If it were, the whole history of the Constitution would show the object of the provision. Bankrupt laws were supposed to be closely connected with commercial regulations. They were considered to be laws nearly affecting the intercourse, trade, and dealing between citizens of different States; and for this reason it was thought wise to enable Congress to make them uniform. The Constitution provided that there should be but one coinage, and but one power to fix the value of foreign coins. The legal medium of payment, therefore, in fulfilment of contracts, was to be ascertained and fixed, for all the States, by Congress, and by Congress alone; and Congress, and Congress alone, was to have the power of providing a uniform mode in which contracts might be discharged without payment. Look to the discussions of the times; to the expositions of the Constitution made to the people by its friends when they urged its adoption; look to all within the Constitution, and all without it; look any where or every where, and you will see one and the same purpose, one and the same meaning; and that meaning cannot be more clearly expressed than the words of the clause themselves express it—that laws to be established by Congress on the subject of bankruptcies shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Now, sir, the gentleman's bill is not uniform. It proposes that there may be one law in Massachusetts, and another in New Jersey. The gentleman's bill includes corporations; but then it gives each State a power to exempt its own corporations, or any of them, from the operation of the law, if it shall so choose. It decides what shall be, in the case of banks, an act of bankruptcy; but then it provides that any State may say, nevertheless, that, in regard to its own banks, or any of them, this shall not be an act of bankruptcy.

Here is the provision:

"Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall apply to or in anywise affect any corporation, or association of persons incorporated or acting under a law of any State of the Union, or any Territory of the United States, where such corporation or association shall be authorized by their charter, or any express law of such State or Territory, to do or commit the act herein declared to be an act of bankruptcy, or where, by any such law of any such State or Territory, the said corporation or association of persons shall or may be exempted from the provisions of this act."

Pray, sir, what sort of uniformity is this? A uniformity which consists in the authorized multiplication of varieties. Who will undertake to defend legislation of this kind, under our power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States? Not only is it in direct violation of the plain text of the Constitution, but it lets in the very evils, every one of them, which the constitutional provision intended to shut out. The Constitution says that Congress may establish uniform laws; the gentleman's bill says that Congress may propose a law, at least so far as corporations are concerned, but that still each State may take what it likes, and reject the rest; and this, he contends, is establishing a uniform law.

I pray, sir, where is this power of exemption to stop? If we may authorize States to exempt their corporations, may we not, with equal propriety, authorize them to exempt all their citizens? May we not say that each State may decide for itself whether it will have any thing to do with the law, when we have passed it; or what parts it will adopt, and what parts it will refuse to adopt?

But, sir, I must wait till some attempt is made to defend this part of the gentleman's bill. I must see some show of propriety, some plausibility, before I reason against it further. In the view I at present have of it, it appears to me utterly repugnant to the plain requirements of the Constitution—destitute not only of all argument for its support, but of all apology also. I see nothing in it but naked unconstitutionality.

But, Mr. President, if these provisions were constitutional, they would still be in the highest degree unjust, and inexpedient, and inadmissible. What is the object of bringing the banks into the bill at all? Certainly there can be no just object, other than to ensure the constant and punctual discharge of their duties, by always paying their notes on presentment. Clearly there can be no object but to prevent their suspensions of payment. And it might be said that this object was kept in view, if the law were uniform, peremptory, inflexible, and applying to all banks. But when you give the power of exemption to the States, you sanction the very evil which you propose to remedy. You profess to prescribe a general rule, and yet authorize and justify its violation. Do not the States now exempt? and is not that the very evil from which we suffer? Is not suspension, under the authority of State exemption, the topic, the discussion of which every day nearly stuns us by its reverberation from the walls of this chamber? The charters of the banks are, in general, well enough. They require punctual specie payments, under severe penalties, and, in some cases, under the penalty of forfeiture. But, under the pressure of circumstances, and from a real or supposed necessity, the States relieve the banks from these penalties, and forbear to enforce the forfeitures. And will they not, most assuredly, also relieve the banks in the same manner, and for the same reason, if they have the power, from the penalties of our bankrupt law? State permission, State indulgence, State exemption, is the very ground on which suspension now stands, and on which it is justified. And it is now proposed that Congress shall give its authority and sanction to all this. It is proposed that Congress shall solemnly recognise the principle, and approve and sanction the practice of State exemption, of the suspension of specie payments, by State authority. If the States will not enforce their own laws against the banks, can any one imagine that they will see the equally or still more severe penalties of our bankrupt law enforced, while they have the power to prevent it?

Some weeks ago the honorable member from Pennsylvania moved for a committee to inquire into the propriety of amending the Constitution, so as to insert a provision giving Congress power to restrain the circulation of small bank notes. I did not concur in his measure, not thinking the Constitution needed amendment in that respect; but his argument was quite intelligible. He said this abolition of small bills could not now be accomplished, because the States could not be brought to act in concert; yet they might all be brought to consent that Congress should establish a uniform rule upon the subject. That was fair reasoning towards a proper object. It went for uniformity on a point of great commercial importance. But how is it here? We do not here propose uniformity; we do not require that one rule may extend over all. Far otherwise; for we propose to authorize difference, dissonance, and confusion. Having the power to establish uniformity, we delegate an authority to create variety. Charged by the Constitution to establish one rule, we ourselves, instead of performing that duty, call upon others to establish different and varying rules. All must see to what this leads, or rather what this is; for it is a measure which would be perfect in its beginning—it would reach its destiny at its commencement—its mischievous tendencies would be accomplished at its birth. The passage of this bill would add the solemn sanction of Congress to the sanction of the States to the suspension of specie payments by the banks. That is the practical sum and substance, the long and the short, of the whole matter.

Sir, if our constitutional power enables us to embrace the banks in this bill, and if we see no insuperable or greatly formidable practical objections, then I think we ought to include them, and to include them all, without any power of escape.

Suppose the bill should be made uniform, then, and to include all banks: have we the power, and is it expedient, to pass it in that shape?

On the motion for a committee made some time ago by the member from Pennsylvania, to which I have already referred, I suggested the opinions which I entertain on one branch of the power of Congress connected with this subject. The constitutional point now arising I do not mean to treat, nor to decide: it is open to others, and will no doubt be discussed by them. But upon the expediency or propriety of including banks and other corporations in this bill, I will say a few words. The State with which I am connected can have as little objection to include banks in the bankrupt bill as any other State. Many persons in Massachusetts, quite respectable and well informed, are in favor of the measure. But it appears to me they have not well considered the practical difficulties. Let us look at what is proposed to be done.

There are eight hundred or a thousand State banks, each with its charter conferring its rights, prescribing its duties, and enjoining penalties. They are banks of deposite, banks of discount, and banks of circulation. It is now generally admitted that they are lawfully created. Their legal existence is established. They comprise, I suppose, two hundred millions of capital. Some of them are founded entirely on private ownership, while in some others the States creating them are proprietors, and in some others again the States are sole proprietors. Some of them have a right to suspend for a limited time; others have not this right; the charter of each being its own constitution.

Such being the general state of things, it is now proposed to subject all these banks to the operation of a bankrupt law; so that when they stop payment for a day or an hour, their property and effects may be seized for distribution among their creditors, and their operations broken up. It is proposed to do this, although the charters of the banks may expressly authorize them to do that very thing which is an act of bankruptcy under this bill, and for which their property is to be thus seized. Here is certainly a direct collision between State authority and the authority of the United States, which ought to be avoided whenever it can be. The act of Congress in this case would be made to repeal or annul pro tanto the law of the State. I do not say that this can in no case be done; but I say that all such collisions ought to be avoided if possible.

It is proposed that Congress shall prescribe duties to the banks not prescribed by their own charters; and for the violation of those duties thus prescribed by Congress, it is proposed to proceed against them as bankrupts, to sequestrate their effects, and virtually annul their franchises. If this can be done, should it be done, without clear and cogent necessity? Without wishing to represent the proposition as extravagant, or speaking of it with disrespect, it seems to me to be bold, if not rash, until a case of absolute necessity is made out. What would become of the bank stock in case of such seizure and sequestration? What extent of depression and fluctuation would attach to it, when such a law should be passed? What would become of the entire circulation of the country, if a general suspension should happen, and all the banks should be thus seized? What would become of the country, creditors, and debtors, and of all its business, if a general suspension should happen, and all the banks should be placed in the hands of the Federal courts, their paper entirely disgraced, and an immediate collection of all their debts attempted to be enforced? What would become of some of the States who own the banks, and of others who derive revenues from them? And how could such immense affairs be administered by the courts of the United States? These difficulties appear to me to be startling. If, indeed, we were quite confident that such a provision would hereafter prevent all general suspensions, we might venture upon the measure; we might expect to be able to deal with here and there an individual case. But this provision is not certain to prevent general suspension in great emergencies or great commercial revolutions. Twice, within a few years, the banks have suspended, notwithstanding the penalties of their own charters, and the laws of their own States. The real truth is, that, in the absence of all regulation or control by Congress, the banks have attempted, and do attempt, regulation by their own concert of action. They make a law for themselves.

A general suspension is the result of a general concurrence, or of a general conviction of the necessity of suspension, on the part of all the banks, or many of them. This has happened; and in the present state of affairs may happen again, notwithstanding a bankrupt law. In my opinion, indeed, it is certain to happen, notwithstanding all the bankrupt laws we can pass, until Congress shall do its duty, by enacting prospective and preventive remedies; and if it should happen, one of two things must ensue—either Congress would be called together to repeal the law; or an utter and dead stop would take place in the payment of debts, in the concerns of commerce, and, indeed, in all the business of life.

In addition to the charters, it is to be remembered that several of the States have provisions of their own, founded on their own statutes, for proceeding against failing banks. Such banks are put into commission, or under sequestration, by the State courts, and a judicial administration and settlement of their affairs take place. Is our bankrupt law expected to supersede these State bankrupt laws? Are our courts to dispossess the State courts?

Sir, I will not pursue this subject further. I repeat, that in the part of the country to which I belong, I believe there is a pretty strong disposition to include the banks in the bankrupt law. The people in that quarter apprehend from it no danger to themselves or their own institutions, and they wish to see banks elsewhere coerced, by the most effectual means, to resume and to maintain specie payments. I need not say that they are among the greatest sufferers by the present most ruinous state of things. They pay, and others do not pay them. They cannot long stand the present state of the currency; and, like them, I am ready to take any practical measure, any thing short of convulsive shocks between State authority and the authority of the United States, to relieve it. But I confess that, for myself, to say nothing of the constitutional points, I see formidable difficulties in subjecting State banks to forfeiture and destruction by an act of bankruptcy. At any rate, if the banks are to be dealt with in bankruptcy at all, their case would require, obviously, very many peculiar provisions, and they should constitute the subject of a bill by themselves. Such a bill should be prospective; the commencement of its operation deferred; the act of bankruptcy more clearly determined; provisions made to avoid, as far as possible, collision with State authorities; and provisions also for superseding the commission, on resumption of payment, or security given. Various provisions of this kind, as it seems to me, would be essentially necessary.

Leaving this very important part of the case, another question arises upon the proposed amendment. Shall the bankrupt act, in its application to individuals, be voluntary only, or both voluntary and compulsory? It is well known that I prefer it should be both. I think all insolvent and failing persons should have power to come in under its provisions, and be voluntary bankrupts; and I think, too, that, as to those who are strictly merchants and traders, creditors ought to have a right to proceed against them, in the commission of the usual acts of bankruptcy, and subject them to the provisions of the act. But the committee think otherwise. They find many objections to this from many parts of the country, and especially from the west. In a country so extensive, with a people so various, with such different ideas and habits in regard to punctuality in commercial dealings, great opposition is anticipated to any measure so strict and so penal as a coercive bankruptcy. I content myself, therefore, with what I can get. I content myself with the voluntary bankruptcy. I am free to confess my leading object to be, to relieve those who are at present bankrupts—hopeless bankrupts—and who cannot be discharged or set free but by a bankrupt act passed by Congress. I confess that their case forms the great motive of my conduct. It is their case which has created the general cry for the measure. Not that their interest is opposed to the interest of creditors; still less that it is opposed to the general good of the country. On the contrary, I believe the interest of creditors would be greatly benefited even by a system of voluntary bankruptcy alone, and I am quite confident that the public good would be eminently promoted. In my judgment, all interests concur; and it is the duty of providing relief for these unfortunate insolvents, in a manner thus favorable to all interests, which I feel urging me forward on this occasion.

And now, sir, whence does this duty arise, which appears to me so pressing and imperative? How has it become so incumbent upon us? What are the considerations, what the reasons, which have so covered our tables with petitions from all classes and all quarters, and which have loaded the air with such loud and unanimous invocations to Congress to pass a bankrupt law?

Sir, let me remind you, in the first place, that commercial as the country is, and having experienced, as it has done, and experiencing, as it now does, great vicissitudes of trade and business, it is now almost forty years since any law has been in force by which any honest man, failing in business, could be effectually discharged from debt by surrendering his property. The former bankrupt law was repealed December 19, 1803. From that day to this, the condition of an insolvent, however honest and worthy, has been utterly hopeless, so far as he depended on any mode of legal relief. This state of things has arisen from the peculiar provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and from the omission by Congress to exercise this branch of its constitutional power. By the Constitution, the States are prohibited from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts. Bankrupt laws impair the obligation of contracts, if they discharge the bankrupt from his debts without payment. The States, therefore, cannot pass such laws. The power, then, is taken away from the States, and placed in our hands. It is true that it has been decided that, in regard to contracts entered into after the passage of any State bankrupt law, between citizens of the State having such law, and sued in the State courts, a State discharge may prevail. So far, effect has been given to State laws. I have great respect, habitually, for judicial decisions; but it has, nevertheless, I must say, always appeared to me that the distinctions on which these decisions are founded are slender, and that they escape, without answering, the great political and commercial objects intended to be secured by this part of the Constitution. But these decisions, whether right or wrong, afford no effectual relief. The qualifications and limitations which I have stated render them useless, as to the purpose of a general discharge. So much of the concerns of every man of business is with citizens of other States than his own, and with foreigners, that the partial extent to which the validity of State discharges reaches is of little benefit.

The States, then, cannot pass effectual bankrupt laws: that is, effectual for the discharge of the debtor. There is no doubt that most, if not all, of the States would now pass such laws, if they had the power; although their legislation would be various, interfering, and full of all the evils which the Constitution of the United States intended to provide against. But they have not the power. Congress, which has the power, does not exercise it. This is the peculiarity of our condition. The States would pass bankrupt laws, but they cannot; we can, but we will not. And between this want of power in the States, and want of will in Congress, unfortunate insolvents are left to hopeless bondage. There are probably one or two hundred thousand debtors, honest, sober, and industrious, who drag out lives, useless to themselves, useless to their families, and useless to their country, for no reason but that they cannot be legally discharged from debts in which misfortunes have involved them, and which there is no possibility of their ever paying. I repeat, again, that these cases have now been accumulating for a whole generation.

It is true, they are not imprisoned; but there may be, and there is, restraint and bondage outside the walls of a jail, as well as in. Their power of earning is in truth taken away; their faculty of useful employment is paralyzed, and hope itself becomes extinguished. Creditors, generally, are not inhumane or unkind; but there will be found some who hold on, and the more a debtor struggles to free himself, the more they feel encouraged to hold on. Their mode of reasoning is, that the more honest the debtor may be, the more industrious, the more disposed to struggle and bear up against his misfortunes, the greater the chance is, that in the end, especially if the humanity of others shall have led them to release him, their own debts may be finally recovered.

Now, in this state of our constitutional powers and duties, in this state of our laws, and with this actually existing condition of so many insolvents before us, it is not too serious to ask every member of the Senate to put it to his own conscience to say whether we are not bound to exercise our constitutional duty. Can we abstain from exercising it? The States give to their own laws all the effect they can. This shows that they desire the power to be exercised. Several States have, in the most solemn manner, made known their earnest wishes to Congress. If we still refuse, what is to be done? Many of these insolvent persons are young men, with young families. Like other men, they have capacities both for action and for enjoyment. Are we to stifle all these forever? Are we to suffer all these persons, many of them every way meritorious and respectable, to be pressed to the earth, forever, by a load of hopeless debt? The existing diversities and contradictions of State laws on the subject admirably illustrate the objects of this part of the Constitution, as stated by Mr. Madison; and they form that precise case for which the clause was inserted. The very evil intended to be provided against is before us, and around us, and pressing us on all sides. How can we, how dare we, make a perfect dead letter of this part of the Constitution, which we have sworn to support? The insolvent persons have not the power of locomotion. They cannot travel from State to State. They are prisoners. To my certain knowledge, there are many who cannot even come here, to the seat of the Government, to present their petitions to Congress, so great is their fear that some creditor will dog their heels, and arrest them in some intervening State, or in this District, in the hope that friends will appear to save them, by payment of the debts, from imprisonment. These are truths, not creditable to the country; but they are truths. I am sorry for their existence. Sir, there is one crime, quite too common, which the laws of man do not punish, but which cannot escape the justice of God; and that is, the arrest and confinement of a debtor, by his creditor, with no motive on earth but the hope that some friend, or some relative, perhaps almost as poor as himself—his mother, it may be, or his sisters, or his daughters—will give up all their own little pittance, and make beggars of themselves, to save him from the horrors of a loathsome jail. Human retribution may not reach this guilt; human feeling may not penetrate the flinty heart that perpetrates it; but an hour is surely coming, with more than human retribution on its wings, when that flint shall be melted, either by the power of penitence and grace, or in the fires of remorse.

Sir, I verily believe that the power of perpetuating debts against debtors, for no substantial good to the creditor himself, and the power of imprisonment for debt, at least as it existed in this country ten years ago, have imposed more restraint on personal liberty than the law of debtor and creditor imposes in any other Christian and commercial country. If any public good were attained, any high political object answered, by such laws, there might be some reason for counselling submission and sufferance to individuals. But the result is bad, every way. It is bad to the public and to the country, which loses the efforts and the industry of so many useful and capable citizens. It is bad to creditors; because there is no security against preferences, no principle of equality, and no encouragement for honest, fair, and seasonable assignments of effects. As to the debtor, however good his intentions or earnest his endeavors, it subdues his spirits, and degrades him in his own esteem; and if he attempts any thing for the purpose of obtaining food and clothing for his family, he is driven to unworthy shifts and disguises, to the use of other persons' names, to the adoption of the character of agent, and various other contrivances to keep the little earnings of the day from the reach of his creditors. Fathers act in the name of their sons; sons act in the name of their fathers; all constantly exposed to the greatest temptation to misrepresent facts and to evade the law, if creditors should strike. All this is evil—unmixed evil. And what is it all for? What good to any body? Who likes it, who wishes it? What class of creditors desires it? What consideration of public good demands it?

Sir, we talk much, and talk warmly, of political liberty, and well we may; for it is among the chief of public blessings. But who can enjoy political liberty if he is deprived, permanently, of personal liberty, and the exercise of his own industry and his own faculties? To those unfortunate individuals, doomed to the everlasting bondage of debt, what is it, that we have free institutions of Government? What is it, that we have public and popular assemblies? Nay, to them, what is even this Constitution itself, in its actual operation, and as we now administer that part of it which was intended for cases like theirs? As we administer it, what is its aspect to them, but an aspect of stern, implacable severity—an aspect of refusal, denial, and frowning rebuke? Nay, more than that, an aspect not only of austerity and rebuke even, but, as they must think it, of plain injustice also; since it will not relieve them, nor suffer others to give them relief. What love can they feel towards the Constitution of their country, which has taken the power of striking off their bond from their own parental State Governments, and yet, inexorable to all the cries of justice and of mercy, holds it, unexercised, in its own fast and unrelenting clench? They find themselves bondsmen, because we will not execute the commands of the Constitution; bondsmen to debt which they cannot pay, and which all know they cannot pay, and which takes away the power of supporting themselves. Other slaves have masters, charged with the duty of support and protection; but their masters neither clothe, nor feed, nor shelter—they only bind.

But, sir, the fault is not in the Constitution. The Constitution is beneficent as well as wise in all its provisions on this subject; but the fault, I must be allowed to say, is in us, who have suffered ourselves quite too long to neglect the duty incumbent upon us. The time will come, sir, when we shall look back and wonder at the long delay of this just and salutary measure. We shall feel, as we now feel, when we reflect on that progress of opinion which has already done so much on another and a connected subject—I mean the abolition of imprisonment for debt. What should we say at this day, if it were proposed to re-establish arrest and imprisonment for debt, as it existed in most of the States even so late as twenty years ago?—I mean for debt alone, for mere pure debt, without charge or suspicion of fraud or falsehood?

Sir, it is about that length of time, I think, since you, who now preside over our deliberations, began here your efforts for the abolition of imprisonment for debt; and a better work was never begun in the Capitol. Ever remembered and ever honored be that noble effort! You drew the attention of the public to the question, whether, in a civilized and Christian country, debt, incurred without fraud, and remaining unpaid without fault, is a crime, and a crime fit to be punished by denying to the offender the enjoyment of the light of heaven, and shutting him up within four walls. Your own good sense, and that instinct of right feeling, which often outruns sagacity, carried you at once to a result to which others were more slowly brought, but to which nearly all have at length been brought, by reason, reflection, and argument. Your movement led the way—it became an example, and has had powerful effect on both sides of the Atlantic. Imprisonment for mere debt, or even arrest and holding to bail for mere debt, no longer exists in England; and former laws on the subject have been greatly modified and mitigated, as we all know, in our States. "Abolition of imprisonment for debt," your own words in the title of your own bill, have become the title of an act of Parliament.

Sir, I am glad of an occasion to pay you the tribute of my own sincere respect for these your labors in the cause of humanity and enlightened policy. For these labors thousands of grateful hearts have thanked you; and other thousands of hearts, not yet full of joy for the accomplishment of their hopes—full rather at the present moment of deep and distressing anxiety—have yet the pleasure to know that your advice, your counsel, and your influence, will all be given in favor of what is intended for their relief, in the bill before us.

Mr. President, let us atone for the omissions of the past, by a prompt and efficient discharge of present duty. The demand for this measure is not partial or local. It comes to us, earnest and loud, from all classes and all quarters. The time is come when we must answer it to our own breasts, if we suffer longer delay or postponement. High hopes, high duties, and high responsibilities concentrate themselves on this measure and this moment. With a power to pass a bankrupt law—that power which no other Legislature in the country possesses—with a power of giving relief to many, doing injustice to none, I again ask every man who hears me, if he can content himself without an honest attempt to exercise that power? We may think it would be better to have left the power with the States; but it was not left with the States; they have it not, and we cannot give it to them. It is in our hands, to be exercised by us, or to be forever useless and lifeless. Under these circumstances, does not every man's heart tell him that he has a duty to discharge? If the final vote shall be given this day, and if that vote shall still leave thousands of our fellow-citizens and their families in hopeless and helpless distress, to everlasting subjection to irredeemable debt, can we go to our beds with satisfied consciences? Can we lay our heads upon our pillows, and, without self-reproach, supplicate the Almighty Mercy to forgive us our debts even as we also forgive our debtors? Sir, let us meet the unanimous wishes of the country, and proclaim relief to the unfortunate throughout all the land. What should hinder? What should stay our hands from this good work? Creditors do not oppose it; they apply for it; debtors solicit it with importunity, earnestness, and anxiety not to be described; the Constitution enjoins it; and all the considerations of justice, policy, and propriety, which are wrapped up in the phrase Public Duty, demand it, as I think, and demand it loudly and imperatively from our hands. Sir, let us gratify the whole country, for once, with the joyous clang of chains—joyous because heard falling from the limbs of men. The wisest among those whom I address can desire nothing more beneficial than this measure, or more universally desired; and he who is youngest may not expect to live long enough to see a better opportunity of causing new pleasures and a happiness long untasted to spring up in the hearts of the poor and the humble. How many husbands and fathers are looking with hopes which hey cannot suppress, and yet hardly dare to cherish, for the result of this debate! How many wives and mothers will pass sleepless and feverish nights, until they know whether they and their families shall be raised from poverty, despondency, and despair, and restored again to the circles of industrious, independent, and happy life!

Sir, let it be to the honor of Congress that, in these days of political strife and controversy, we have laid aside for once the sin that most easily besets us, and, with unanimity of counsel and with singleness of heart and of purpose, have accomplished for our country one measure of unquestionable good.

SPEECH OF MR. TALLMADGE,

OF NEW YORK,

In Senate, May 22, 1840.—On the Bankrupt Bill.

Mr. TALLMADGE said: I do not wish to protract this debate; and as the several questions which are presented for the consideration of the Senate in the bill and amendment before us have been very ably and elaborately discussed, I shall content myself with presenting a very few remarks on this subject. I wish to act upon it promptly and efficiently. I desire the enactment of such a bankrupt law as shall respond to the call of the country, and grant relief to honest, unfortunate men. That we have authority to pass such a law, I do not doubt; and that the welfare of the country demands it, all will admit.

The prominent feature of a bankrupt law, and the one that distinguishes it from all other laws, is, that it cancels or dissolves the contract between debtor and creditor, and leaves to the former the uninterrupted enjoyment of his future acquisitions. This is a high attribute of sovereignty, a great conservative power, and is necessarily inherent in all Governments. It is the protecting, paternal power, which, like the power to pardon offences against the criminal laws, may be exercised by the supreme power in a state, for the benefit of the whole people. This power has been exercised in all civilized Governments, and with the most beneficial and salutary effects. It has been exercised by this Government; and neither the power to pass such laws, nor the expediency of them, has been questioned by the people beyond this Chamber. Why, then, is it that laws have not be enenacted, by which the child of misfortune may be protected against persecution and oppression? Your State Governments have done much to meliorate the condition of the honest debtor; insolvent laws have been enacted, and laws abolishing imprisonment for debt have been passed; but still the debtor remains a bondman, without the means of rendering himself useful to his country or to society.

I apprehend, sir, that the great obstacle to the enactment of such laws may be found in the fact that this branch of Congress is not so near to the people as the Legislatures of the several States. We are not so conversant with local wants and exigencies, and are not so capable of appreciating the peculiar necessity for the enactment of laws that relate immediately to the fortunes of individuals. Be this as it may, Congress undoubtedly possesses the power to grant the relief called for. It belongs to that class of powers which mark the practical wisdom displayed by the framers of the Constitution. It is a power which, when properly exercised, will "promote intercourse between the several States." It is one of those important powers which were granted by the people of the States, in order to form, in the concise and comprehensive language of the preamble to our Constitution, "a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity." The Constitution was intended to confer more benefits upon the people than could be secured without it. It declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." All subjects of legislation that would yield a larger liberty, and as much protection and happiness to the citizens, were granted to the Federal Government by the sovereign States that formed the Constitution.

In a Government like ours, no greater bond of union can exist, than free and uninterrupted intercourse between different sections of the country. Hence the incalculable benefits which have been bestowed by the States upon this nation in the construction of internal improvements, the extending of canals and railroads into the great west, and the rapid, cheap, and safe means of transporting persons and property. This important tie between the east and the west, the north and the south, was duly estimated by WASHINGTON; but it was reserved to the genius of CLINTON to give a practical illustration of its advantages. I trust, sir, that the States will continue to be guided by this illustrious example, and persevere amidst all their embarrassments, until every section of our country shall be traversed by the railroad and locomotive.

Whilst we are encouraging intercourse between different sections of the country, we must not be unmindful that each of the several States has enacted laws to enforce the collection of debts, and that the discharge of an honest unfortunate debtor in one State does not protect him or his property from seizure by the Federal courts on behalf of a creditor in another State, or against the operation of the laws of any other State whilst within its jurisdiction. To remove this great cause of dissatisfaction and jealousy, the States conferred upon Congress the power to "establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States." Nor did they stop here. They deemed it important that they should not have the power to interfere with the contracts of citizens, and, therefore, they divested themselves of all power over the subject, by declaring that "no State shall pass any law impairing the obligations of contracts." Thus the States have not only conferred upon Congress the right to pass uniform bankrupt laws, but they have conferred upon it the exclusive power. This attribute of sovereignty, therefore, has been conveyed by the States to the General Government. As Congress possesses the exclusive right to enact bankrupt laws, and as this grant was made for the benefit of the whole people, I hold that the power and the duty to exercise it are correlative terms. The omission to exercise this power strikes out of existence this high attribute of sovereignty, and we present to the world the strange anomaly of twenty-six independent sovereignties which would but cannot exercise this power, and a General Government which should but will not exercise it.

The chairman of the committee has said that, as we are bound to refer to British precedents for all information on this subject, the power or right to pass bankrupt laws must be controlled by the laws existing in England at the time our Constitution was adopted. Sir, is this so? Are we bound by laws that no longer bind the people of England, and to whom we owe no allegiance? Surely this is a construction which few will contend for. Are we, the people of the United States, bound to obey, as part of our own Constitution, the antiquated laws and customs of England? No, sir. The framers of the Constitution intended no such thing. They referred not to the existing laws in England or the colonies on this subject, but to the power— the omnipotent power of the Government over it. "Congress shall have power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy." How has this power been exercised in England? Has it not been the subject of continued legislation? At one time the bankrupt law included all classes; afterwards, it was restricted to traders; and again it was extended to all persons. Thus the law has been made to extend and contract, to meet the ever-varying opinions of the people. Laws which embrace voluntary and involuntary bankrupts have long since been enacted; and the Government, for several hundred years, has exercised this power without restriction and without question. Neither the people, the courts, nor the Parliament of Great Britain, have doubted the power of Government to enact any law in regard to the relation of debtor and creditor.

This power, and to the extent it has been or can be exercised in England, is possessed by every independent Government. The old Thirteen Colonies, when they declared themselves free, sovereign, and independent States, on the 4th of July, 1776, became, ipso facto, severally invested with this power, in as full and ample a manner as it was possessed and could be exercised by the Parliament of Great Britain. If, therefore, the State sovereignties had entered into no compact, had formed no Constitution, had granted no power to a General Government, they would have possessed the same power over the subject of bankruptcy, and could have exercised it in the same manner, that it can be exercised in England. As the States possessed this attribute of sovereignty, it was in their power to convey it to any Government founded upon a grant of powers by the States. This power is granted in the Constitution; and its exercise is left to the discretion of Congress, with no restriction or limitation, except that all laws in relation to it shall be uniform throughout the United States. This restriction upon the discretion of Congress was the very object for which the grant was made. Under a number of State sovereignties, uniformity could not be secured. Their laws would differ on this subject, and thus "the citizens of each State could not enjoy all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States," according to the true intent of the people in "forming a more perfect union," by the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. We are now experiencing the wisdom of this grant in the want of harmony and uniformity on this subject amongst the several States. By this view of the origin of this power, and the object for which it was granted, it is evident that the word "uniform" does not relate to classes of citizens that may be included, but means to declare that whatever class or classes of persons shall be included in a bankrupt law, it shall be made to operate upon the same class in every State. In other words, Congress shall not include one class in Louisiana, and another class in New York, nor make a law applicable to one State that does not affect all. The meaning of the word uniform is well settled in the Constitution. "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." "Congress shall have power to pass uniform laws of naturalization." No one can mistake its meaning or import in these cases. All that is required is, that the same regulations on these subjects shall prevail in all the States. But as I have designed, throughout my remarks not to dwell on topics which have been fully discussed by others, I will dismiss this part of the subject with the single remark—that, to my mind, no provision of the Constitution is more explicit, and no language could have more clearly conveyed the meaning of the framers of that instrument, than that which is there employed.

Having shown that the power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution is unlimited, I now proceed to inquire how it shall be exercised? and what is the cause of the demand for the exercise of this power?

Sir, not many years since, this country presented to the eye of the statesman and philanthropist cause for congratulation in a scene of prosperity and happiness unsurpassed at any time, or under any Government. It was not confined to a narrow district of country, nor to a privileged class of the community. It spread over the whole length and breadth of our land, and was diffused amongst, and enjoyed by, the whole population. Manufactures flourished; agriculture returned not only an abundant harvest of the necessaries of life to the laborer and husbandman, but a price commensurate with his highest hopes. Trade and commerce yielded to the industrious and intelligent merchant a rich reward, and every department of the arts and sciences felt the genial influences of universal prosperity; industry, capacity, integrity, and intelligence became capital; the man possessed of these properties and qualifications was lifted to a level with the wealthy; this species of capital became the great leveller, or democratic principle by which the power of wealth was placed upon a level with character and credit. Under this state of general prosperity, and the influence of these democratic principles, great numbers were induced to engage in trade, and incur large obligations, under the belief that property would continue to be easily converted into money, and that confidence in character would continue throughout the land. All this prosperity, and their fond hopes, were doomed to meet with a fatal and appalling overthrow. Suddenly, as if a tornado had visited our land with its devastating ravages, we find the hopes of the merchant, the fond anticipations of the farmer, the prospects of the manufacturer, and the dependence of the laborer, overwhelmed and buried in one common ruin.

In the commercial and trading circles, doubt is the forerunner of evil, and the destruction of prosperity. Loss of credit is loss of property, the wreck of hope, and beginning of despair. Property of all kinds loses a portion of its value when it is deprived of its convertible character. Credit alone, in this country, renders property saleable. In proportion to the amount of confidence and industry, intelligence and activity, is the amount of personal responsibility; and this constitutes the great bulk of the credit of the country. When individual credit becomes impaired, a general curtailment of business ensues. All wish to sell and collect, and none to buy and pay. And thus the very struggle that is produced brings about the result which all desire to avoid. In this trading and commercial country, every man is directly or indirectly connected in buying and selling; and business operations become so multifarious and complex, that the creditor is a debtor, and the debtor a creditor; therefore, as soon as confidence is shaken, and the means of transferring property ceases, all become involved in one common ruin.

Let not the wise and prudent chide the unfortunate with his overthrow. All are liable to accidents which no human prudence or foresight can avoid or prevent. The great fire that occurred in the city of New York on the 16th day of December, 1835, destroyed more than twenty-five millions of property, and inflicted an injury upon the institutions and merchants of that city that years will not obliterate. Who can contemplate the destruction of stores and warehouses, covering forty acres, in the most active business section of that great city, filled with costly merchandise collected from every country on the globe, and not feel that this misfortune was too sudden and overwhelming to come within the ordinary rules of commercial prudence or foresight? Beneath the burning and crumbling walls of that great city lie buried the hopes of thousands. So great and unprecedented was the calamity, that the insurer and the insured met with one common fate. And thus in this case, as in that of the sudden depreciation of the value of property, the creditor of yesterday becomes the debtor and bankrupt of to-day, without prospect or hope of being able to release himself from the vast load of debt which these misfortunes have thrust upon him.

It is because of the overthrow and ruin of hundreds of thousands of intelligent, industrious, and honest men, that this cry comes up to you from this broad land. It comes in tones and with a volume that leaves no room to doubt the source from which it emanates, or the depth of feeling and sympathy which produces it. It comes from farmers and manufacturers, merchants and traders, artisans and laborers. It comes, sir, from your cities and villages, from the grain-growing country on the borders of the great lakes, and from the cotton and rice fields on the Gulf of Mexico. From the east and west, the north and south, there comes but one prayer: whether in the petition of your humble citizen, the memorial of your populous towns, or the resolves of the Legislatures of the States we represent, all call upon us to release the honest, the unfortunate debtor; all appreciate his sufferings, and desire to rescue him from the degradation and despair into which he has been cast by occurrences that he could not foresee, and over which he had no control.

Sir, there can be no doubt as to the causes that have produced this universal call upon Congress. From the first memorial presented here, to the last petitions that have been laid upon your table, but one request has been made. I, sir, had the honor of presenting the first memorial on this subject. It was prepared and signed by Silas M. Stilwell, of the city of New York. It set forth in a clear and distinct manner the claims of the debtor for relief, the benefit to the moral character of our country, the great importance of this measure to the prosperity of trade and commerce, the evident advantage to the creditor, and the useless and hopeless condition of hundreds of thousands of unfortunate men, their families and dependants, unless relieved by an act of Congress. All this was presented and illustrated with great ability, and concluded with these emphatic words:

"Upon an application for a discharge under a bankrupt law, the debtor should be required to establish his integrity, and make a conveyance of all his property. When these two acts shall have been done to the satisfaction of the proper tribunal, the debtor should be forthwith discharged from all his debts. If such a law, simple in its provisions, and direct in its effects, shall receive the sanction of Congress, the interest of society will be harmonized and promoted, the unfortunate relieved and sustained, and the laws respected and enforced."

This memorial was published in all the papers of the city of New York, and different sections of the Union, and with universal approbation, and embodies the reasons upon which all the other petitions are founded. This petition was ordered to be printed, and is now upon the files of the Senate.

And now, Mr. President, whilst referring to this memorial, I trust I shall be excused in taking this occasion to do a simple act of justice to the gentleman whose name I have introduced. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts paid a merited compliment to the Vice President of the United States for an early movement made by him in Congress to abolish imprisonment for debt; and, although his efforts were unsuccessful, he is entitled, nevertheless, to the honor of being amongst the first to move in this great work of reform. Examples of this sort have led the way to the accomplishment of much that has since been done to blot out this feature of barbarism from our statute-books. Amongst those who have been the pioneers in this great undertaking, no name stands more conspicuous than that of SILAS M. STILWELL—and to none is greater honor due for unwearied exertions and untiring perseverance in this great cause of philanthropy. To his talents and eminent exertions are the State of New York and the country indebted for the melioration of the condition of the debtors. He is the father of the non-imprisonment act of the State of New York; and although others co-operated with him in this great work, yet to him is due the honor of having procured the enactment of the first law that absolutely and unconditionally abolished imprisonment for debt. To accomplish this great object was a work of no ordinary magnitude; and, as I was also a member of the Legislature, I can bear witness to the thousand obstacles that were overcome, and prejudices encountered, in bringing the public mind to consent to this humane experiment. For several subsequent sessions ineffectual efforts were made to repeal the act. And, as an evidence of the increasing opinion of the public in favor of justice and humanity, I have the pleasure of informing the Senate that, at the late session, the Legislature of the State of New York abolished the last vestige of this barbarism by repealing, by a unanimous vote of both Houses, the law which authorized the arrest of a non-resident del[illegible]

The example of New York has had a salutary influence in many States, and upon the General Government. It was the cause of the passage of a bill that I had the honor of introducing here, to prevent persons from being imprisoned in any State upon process issuing out of the courts of the United States, where, by the laws of such State, imprisonment for debt had been abolished. I trust, sir, this inclination of the public mind in favor of the liberty and rights of unfortunate men will increase until equality in all the privileges of a free people shall be established; and I am glad to find, as the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. STRANGE) has said, that this is the effect of the democratic principle in our legislation. Formerly, creditors alone were represented; their rights were guarded and amply protected; but the unfortunate debtor seldom found an advocate in legislative halls. Now, under our system of government, his rights are recognised, and the creditor has become convinced that the freedom of the debtor will promote the happiness of both, and advance the prosperity of the public.

I think, sir, I have shown that the legislation demanded of us is for the relief of the unfortunate debtor; and therefore I conclude that the bill introduced by the majority of the Judiciary Committee, which provides for the relief of voluntary bankrupts, is a direct response to the call of the country. The honorable chairman objects to this bill, because it does not include involuntary bankrupts also; and contends that this omission destroys its uniformity, and renders it unconstitutional. I have already inquired into the meaning of the word "uniform," and if my construction be correct, then there is no necessity for including these two classes in one bill.

Several weeks since, the Senator from Massachusetts and myself, at the request of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, (Mr. WALL,) introduced bills on this subject, including both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy. These bills were the same in principle, but different in detail, and were referred to the Judiciary Committee. A majority of that committee, after mature consideration, have reported a bill which is applicable to voluntary bankrupts only; and, sir, after examining the bill, I have determined to give it my support, because I believe it presents in a more acceptable form the relief which the petitions call for. In the amendments proposed by the chairman are included voluntary and involuntary bankrupts and corporations. And it has been gravely urged that, unless these provisions are included in the same bill, it will not be constitutional. As there has been no argument presented which proves that what is constitutional in one bill would not be constitutional in two, I shall not attempt to refute a proposition that is not sustained by any known rule of construction.

I will now consider the necessity and expediency of including any provisions in this bill relating to compulsory bankruptcy. Between the remedies proposed for cases of voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, by the amendment under consideration, there is no resemblance in form or effect. One proposes a means of relief for the honest, unfortunate man, who will surrender his property for the benefit of his creditors; whilst the other presents to the creditor a new system by which to detect and punish a fraudulent debtor. One is a civil, and the other in the nature of a criminal proceeding. One is the voluntary act of the debtor, the other is a compulsory proceeding on the part of the creditor. Is there any necessary connexion between these propositions? Should a measure of relief to misfortune be coupled with provisions to punish fraudulent debtors? The chairman does not present an objection to the subject-matter of the bill—to the plain and simple plan of relief; but he seeks to attach to it a variety of debateable questions, which are foreign to the prayer of the petitioners, and disconnected with the principles of the bill. To amend, by adding a distinct proposition, is a novel mode of legislating. Is it not obnoxious to many objections which are generally raised against bills when the union of subjects tends to multiply supporters? Is it not equally unfair, if it operates to defeat questions otherwise unobjectionable? By such unnecessary amendments this bill may be defeated, although a majority of the Senate may be in favor of it, or provisions to which a majority are opposed may become a law. Let us legislate on this subject as we do upon all others. Let these distinct questions be embodied in two bills, that each Senator may be enabled to record his vote for or against them, without being compelled to pursue a course inconsistent with his wishes or revolting to his feelings. There can be no serious objection to our granting relief to the honest unfortunate man. He seeks these halls, because his only hope lies here; we, and we alone, can set him free.

But the chairman urges that we disregard the rights of the creditor, and provide him with no means to enforce his contract. Sir, does that Senator believe that creditors have embraced this opportunity to obtain additional laws to inflict new pains and penalties upon debtors? And is this the reason why Congress is pressed by petitions? Why are your tables burdened with memorials from thousands and hundreds of thousands of the citizens of the several States? Why do the State Legislatures, by solemn resolves, duly certified under their seal of state, and transmitted here by their several Governors, call upon Congress to establish uniform laws of bankruptcy? Is it not because the Constitution declares that "no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts," and that "Congress shall have power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy?" Do they not call upon Congress to do that, and that only, which Congress alone can do? The States have not surrendered the right to pass laws for the benefit of the creditor. Their power is supreme. They have enacted laws without number for the collection of debts and enforcing the performance of contracts. Is there any complaint that the laws are not sufficiently severe? Are there not laws of every kind and description, from the warrant of a justice of the peace to the attachment in the court of chancery? It is true these remedies vary in the several States, but they are made to suit the peculiar situation of the communities in which they exist. The wit of legislators has been exhausted in devising means to extract every dollar from the debtor, and cast him penniless upon the world. He is examined under oath, at the pleasure of the creditor, with the pains and penalties of perjury before him, for the purpose of discovering property which properly belongs to the creditors; and this proceeding, which appears to leave no further room for improvement, is what Lord Brougham calls "the perfection of the law."

Sir, can any one suppose that further remedies are needed for the creditor? And is there a Senator here who believes that the State he represents would call upon Congress to enact laws for the collection of debts within its borders? Can we believe that the State Legislatures would call upon Congress to do what they have the power to do, and which they have heretofore done to the entire satisfaction of the people? Sir, the Legislature by which I was appointed, and which passed the resolution upon your table, does not desire you to exercise that power. No necessity for any additional laws for the collection of debts is recognised; but the resolution declares—

"That the Congress of the United States is imperiously called upon, by the embarrassments which have prostrated the business of the country, to exercise that power conferred by the Constitution which authorizes them to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies of natural persons throughout the United States."

I have been unable to discover any necessity or reason for the enactment of any laws for the collection of debts, where it is so manifest that neither the States nor the people desire it. I was surprised to hear the Senator from New Jersey intimate that this bill would relieve the debtor to the injury of the creditor, and that it would open the door to fraud and perjury. Why, sir, does not the Senator know that his own bill contains all the provisions that are embraced in the one reported by the majority of the committee, and is obnoxious to the same objection? But I deny that the creditor will be a loser by this measure. Nay, sir, I contend that he is deeply interested in procuring the release of the debtor. My own views on this subject cannot be more clearly and cogently expressed than in the language of the able memorial to which I have referred.

"The laws now in force on the subject of debtor and creditor operate with painful severity upon the honest and industrious debtor; and their effect tends to discourage his honest exertions, and deprive him of that energy and hope which alone can enable him to retrieve his fallen fortunes.

"The law is searchingly severe to discover and take from him, under the solemnity of an oath, all the property he may possess of every kind and description; and, whatever may be the general impression among the ill-informed, the legal profession well know that the most adroit and cunning knaves can scarcely conceal any property from the hands of the officer. If one examination is not satisfactory, his creditor may take years for inquiry, and continue to put him under oath, for the purpose of discovering any property that may be secreted or conveyed for the purpose of defrauding his creditors. This, however, does not satisfy the law and the creditor. The debtor is still required to pay, while the creditor will not allow him to accumulate capital to transact business, nor permit him to borrow of a friend and invest it in trade. "Honesty is not the best policy" for him. A character for integrity is worse than useless. For if he can point to a pure and spotless life; if he can show that his integrity, industry, and ability, in the various situations in which he has been placed, have been unimpeachable, his creditors will grasp their claims with more tenacity, under a belief that they can yet wring something from his hard earnings, or the sympathy of friends or relatives. If, however, a debtor is reputed to be dishonest, dissipated, and generally dissolute in his habits, his creditor is always ready and willing to compromise for his claim, and take any thing he can get, under the belief that if he does not take what is offered, he will obtain nothing by holding the claim against one so destitute of character and principle.

"Thus, under the operation of our laws, a character for honesty and integrity falls upon the poor debtor like a blighting curse; and he has many reasons to envy the good fortune of the knave, whose character for dishonesty releases him from bondage.

"The situation of an honest debtor, under the operation of our laws, can be of no service to any person, and is severely injurious to the community. After a debtor has surrendered his property, and thus deprived himself of the means by which he transacted business, what can he do if he still remains subject to the claims of his creditors? Suppose him in the prime of life, with a family dependent upon him; a merchant by education, and eminently qualified for mercantile pursuits; in debt many thousand dollars beyond all his means of payment: how is he to proceed to acquire property? He is prevented from engaging again in trade, because every thing he may purchase will be subject to the claims of his creditors; they will watch his movements with the Argus eyes of interest, and each will be striving to pounce upon their victim before others shall be apprized of the value of the discovery. The power of the Chancery Court is invoked upon every suspicious appearance; and, if the debtor is engaged in any pursuit in which money is required, a bill is filed for the purpose of again examining the debtor on oath, and introducing other testimony, which may enable the creditor to seize upon any property the debtor may have in his possession. This proceeding may be continued during the debtor's life, and afterwards his children and administrators annoyed in like manner. What, then, can an honest debtor do? He is compelled to abandon the business for which his education and habits have fitted him, or submit to work for hire as a clerk, and thus earn a pittance for the support of his family, without a hope of bettering his condition. If he does this, his creditors surely cannot be benefited by it; and, if he does not, what else can his creditors expect him to do, which shall enable him to liquidate the debts which his misfortunes have thrust upon him? Do creditors propose any business? Do they hold out any hope for themselves or their debtor? It is a very uncommon occurrence that creditors devise any way by which a debtor can obtain a living. They generally turn from the unfortunate man with no sympathy, but with a feeling akin to anger, and are generally impressed with a vague belief that they are more to be sympathized with than he, although they may not be able to detect any one act that is obnoxious to censure.

"Many debtors, after vain and fruitless efforts to compromise and get released from their debts, become disheartened and discouraged, and, by losing all pride and spirit of ambition, contract idle and dissolute habits, which terminate in an untimely death, or in making them a burden to their friends or the public.

"There are a large number, however, who, being often thus driven from their pursuits, and feeling the moral obligation to support and protect their families, seek to obtain some petty office, by which to procure a precarious and dependent living. To so great an extent does the evil herein complained of prevail, that, of the thousands who are seeking to obtain the emoluments of office, more than three-fifths, it is supposed, are forced to become applicants because they have been unfortunate in business, and are involved in debt to an extent that renders payment entirely hopeless. When this fact is properly appreciated, few will be surprised at the great number of intelligent business men who are not only willing, but desirous, to obtain the smallest ministerial office in the gift of the appointing power. And this state of things must continue to exist until an unfortunate debtor shall be protected by the laws, and permitted again to establish a credit, and support his family from the fruits of his industry.

"The laws compel a man to be dishonest. If he would accumulate property, he must become a knave or an idler; he must learn to dissemble and cheat. He must conceal his earnings under the name of a child or a friend; and the more accomplished he shall prove himself in his new profession, the more he will secure for himself and his family, to protect them against sickness and want.

"When he shall thus have obtained property, in defiance of the laws, and in opposition to the wishes of his creditors, does any one suppose he will use the property thus accumulated to pay his debts? Did ever a case of this kind occur? And why has it not? Because he has found the law and his creditors his worst enemies. They have made him a knave; they compelled him to dissimulate, and he looks upon those to whom he owes money as his greatest enemies. It was in the power of his creditors to release him from bondage, and, by restoring him to society and business, enable him to become serviceable to himself and his family. His creditors chose to hold him in a degrading servitude, in which his pride and ambition were broken, and his mind became devoted to devise means to evade the law, and protect himself against those he believed his unrelenting persecutors.

"The annals of our country do not produce an instance of a debtor having paid his debts by his own efforts, after having become insolvent to a considerable amount, when his creditors have refused to release him; and, on the contrary, hundreds of cases can be shown where debtors have discharged all their debts, including principal and interest, out of money they had accumulated in the transaction of business, after they had obtained a legal release from their creditors. In the one case, it is impossible for an honest debtor to obtain property; in the other, he has every motive for exertion.

"If a bankrupt law shall be enacted, which will enable an honest man to obtain a discharge upon the surrender of his property, what will be the effect upon the debtor, the creditor, and society?

"The debtor will then feel that the laws have made 'honesty the best policy;' that if he act honestly in all his transactions, the law will protect his rights, and release him from oppression; that he need not seek to purchase the good-will of any unprincipled individual because he happens to owe him money; but that, if he adheres to his integrity, his misfortunes shall not be charged upon him as a crime.

"Under a well-devised law, an honest man that finds himself unable to pay his debts will immediately seek to surrender all his property, and render an account of his losses; and upon surrender being made, and a satisfactory account rendered of all his effects, and the causes of his insolvency, he will be at once restored to credit and society. Thus the interest of the debtor and his integrity both stimulate him to do all that will elevate his character and render him a valuable member of society.

"His creditors, instead of being his enemies, and persecuting him, will, if they think he has acted honestly, and is competent to transact business, be anxious to afford him any assistance in their power, and promote, as far as possible, his prosperity. They will readily discover that an honest man will appreciate their kindness to him, and be anxious to accumulate property to discharge those equitable obligations which the many favors they may have done him will have made more binding than any strictly legal debt. He will be received among his creditors without reproach; and the misfortunes of an honest debtor, instead of making him an outcast and a degraded man, will call around him a host of interested friends, who will be deeply anxious to sustain his character and promote his welfare."

There is a force of conclusion from this reasoning that should satisfy every creditor that his prospects are much better after his debtor is released under a bankrupt law, than whilst he continues in bondage. But, sir, there are questions of public justice and policy which are connected with the liberty of an unfortunate debtor that outweigh, in my opinion, all other considerations.

My next objection to the amendment is, that it proposes to place the charters of the several incorporated institutions of the States in the power of the Federal Government. The disastrous effect of a bankrupt law when applied to manufacturing companies has been fully portrayed by the Senator from Rhode Island, (Mr. DIXON,) and I will therefore confine my remarks to its effects upon the incorporated banks in the several States. The power of the States to incorporate and establish banking institutions has never been seriously questioned, here or elsewhere. The States have exercised the power, and the innumerable banks that are now found in every section of the Union have been created by them. Some are, in whole or in part, the property of the States in which they are located, and exist at the pleasure of the authority that created them. By the terms of their charters, they are made subject to fixed rules and regulations; and for any act of omission or commission inconsistent with the laws which are prescribed for their government, they forfeit the privileges and immunities conferred upon them. They also authorize them to do certain things at certain times that are contrary to the general laws by which these institutions are bound, and they preserve to them the same rights and privileges as if those acts had not been done. Thus, the State Legislatures cause the acts of the banks to conform to the general interest of the community. Has the General Government power to destroy these institutions? Can Congress by a law take from the States the supervision and control over the creatures of their own creation—institutions that are an emanation of their own sovereignty? If they are legitimate subjects of a bankrupt law, then Congress has the power to destroy them at pleasure. It is not only the suspension of specie payments for fifteen days, as prescribed in the amendment, that may subject them to the operation of the penalties of the bankrupt law. Congress may declare any act an act of bankruptcy; and it has already been suggested by the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. STRANGE) that no bank should be permitted to issue more paper than it has specie in its vaults. Any Senator who is acquainted with the business of banking must perceive that such a law would soon close the doors of nearly every bank in the Union. Individuals and States invest their money in these institutions for the purpose of obtaining a fair interest. Although they are created for the accommodation of the public, they are expected to yield a fair and reasonable profit to the owners. Under this restriction, we should soon have no paper money but Treasury notes, and no bank of issue but the Treasury. I do not say that such is the design of those who support this proposition; but it is apparent that this principle would authorize the Federal Government to prescribe at its pleasure the acts which shall constitute bankruptcy on the part of these institutions, and thus bring them within its power, and subject to its control.

The Senator from Mississippi, (Mr. WALKER,) with his characteristic frankness, declared yesterday that he wished to bring all the banks under the operation of a bankrupt law, because he believed them all bankrupt, and wished to wipe them all out of existence, and free the country from the curse of paper money. If I misapprehended the Senator, I shall be pleased to be corrected.

[Mr. WALKER said the Senator had quoted him correctly; he was opposed to all banks of issue, and all paper money, and was in favor of an exclusive metallic currency.]

I was sure, said Mr. T., I had not misunderstood the Senator, because he has repeatedly stated the same opinions, here and elsewhere. But, sir, the reasons of the Senator, so far from inducing me to wish to embrace the institutions of the States in this bill, have caused me to enter my solemn protest against it. I am in favor of a well-regulated banking system, and opposed to an exclusive metallic currency. My motto has always been: "Preserve and regulate, but not destroy." I cannot, therefore, consent to destroy what we cannot create. I am not willing to bring them under the power of the Federal Government, by which they may be swept out of existence without the consent of the States that created them. To them is confided the power to create; with them alone should be the power to destroy. They have prescribed rules by which they "preserve and regulate," and they will continue to do so. Those who doubt this proposition question the ability of the people for self-government.

If there were no constitutional objections to this course, is it expedient or proper to exercise it? Many States have permitted the banks, without forfeiting their charters, to continue business, although they are unable to pay specie on demand. Are we prepared to place the Federal Government in an attitude of hostility to the States? Can any Senator believe that the States will be content to see their manufacturing and other corporations made subject to such rules and restrictions as we may propose, without regard to the legislation of the States? And has it come to this—that the control of the States over their institutions will be resisted by their representatives here? Shall we, the creatures of their will, undertake to arraign their legislation, and enact laws to counteract it? Is it right to attempt to intercept the current of their legislation, and, by "one fell swoop," destroy what they are laboring to preserve? Sir, I see no necessity for this exercise of power: we have already causes of jealousy existing between the States and the Federal Government, and I do not wish to see them increased. I claim to have a full share of moral courage, but I confess I am not bold enough to enter voluntarily upon such an experiment as this. It is the most monstrous assumption of federal power ever attempted.

We are told by some Senators that this regulation will prevent a suspension of specie payments by the banks. But how can this be shown, and what evidence is there to prove that such will be the case? The State laws already work a forfeiture of the charter of the banks for a failure to pay specie; but these penalties are insufficient to effect the object when the interest of the whole community requires a suspension. When such a crisis has arrived, the State Legislatures have interposed; not for the benefit of the banks, (for they are generally creditors to a much greater amount than they are debtors,) but to relieve the community, who are debtors to the banks, and who cannot pay their debts to these institutions in coin. No Legislature legalizes a suspension of specie payments by the banks. This they cannot do, because the Constitution provides that gold and silver coin alone shall be a legal tender in payment of debts. The legal remedies remain the same for both debtor and creditor, and the Legislature only provides that the bank may continue business without forfeiting its charter. The courts are continued open to the creditor, and he can compel the bank to pay specie, without any regard to the act of the Legislature. There is, therefore, no suspension of specie payments, except that payment is not promptly made. If the charter of the institution should be forfeited by its inability to procure specie to meet its demands, it is evident it must call on its debtors to pay, without the power to lend; and thus, whilst the demand for payments from the people would increase, the ability to pay would diminish. A bankrupt law in such a case would be to the banks and the people the bed of Procrustes. It would be unyielding, and the victims would be stretched or mutilated to fit its iron frame. Had such a law existed in May, 1837, it could not have prevented a general suspension. That event was produced by the peculiar state of the country, and the terrors of a bankrupt law would have produced no beneficial effect. What would have been the consequences upon the interests of individuals, had such a law existed? The banking institutions throughout the Union would have been placed in the hands and under the control of the federal courts. Assignees would have taken an account of their assets, and the debts due them placed in the hands of attorneys for collection. Can you imagine, sir, the state of the country, if two hundred millions of the notes of these institutions had been withdrawn from circulation, and the whole of their assets, amounting to some six hundred millions, placed in the hands of officers for collection? The consequences cannot be described or imagined. Sir, a tornado that would have laid desolate whole States, or an earthquake which should have opened its ponderous jaws and swallowed up whole hecatombs of victims, could hardly have produced such ruin and dismay. This great calamity was averted by the timely interposition of the State Legislatures. And who questions the propriety of such intervention? No one, certainly, who entertains any respect for the intelligence of the people. This measure, therefore, can work no possible good, but may produce a train of evils which may afflict the country for centuries to come.

Again: the most prominent and distinguishing features of a bankrupt law do not, and cannot, apply to corporations. I have shown that the people and the States apply to Congress, because the States have divested themselves of the power to relieve debtors from their contracts, and conferred it upon the Federal Government. Corporations do not seek to be discharged from their debts, and require no exemption from imprisonment. They cannot travel from one State to another; and, therefore, conflicting State legislation does not affect them.

In short, all this over-anxiety to curtail the powers of the States is a virtual usurpation of authority, and not countenanced by any call of necessity or expediency connected with sound legislation.

It has been strongly urged by the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WALL) that we must confine our legislation to the acts of the British Parliament, as they are to be found prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution. If his argument is worth any thing, when applied to the persons enumerated in those acts, it will also apply with the same force to corporations. Is the Senator aware that corporations were expressly excluded from the action of the bankrupt law of Great Britain? At the end of the 18th section of the proposed amendment, I find a proviso, which allows the States to exempt their incorporated companies from the operation of this act. This exception is undoubtedly unconstitutional, because it permits the States to destroy that uniformity which is an essential feature in every bankrupt law. This point has been so clearly demonstrated by gentlemen who have preceded me, that it appears to be generally conceded.

Sir, I put it to the honorable chairman to say, who asks for this extraordinary exercise of power? Do the States, who are the legitimate representatives of this power, call upon you to interfere in their local affairs? What State has sent its memorial here? What warrant have you for wishing to wrest from the States the control over their own affairs, and assuming to dispose of the creatures of their will at your pleasure? Sir, the State of New York has asked for no such interference. Her Legislature has called upon Congress to grant relief to the unfortunate; but she has expressly repudiated any attempt to interfere with banking institutions.

This attempt to control the moneyed institutions of the States has met with very little countenance heretofore. In 1827, this subject was before Congress; and Mr. Van Buren, then a Senator from New York, expressed his disapprobation in the following words:

"It had been said, formerly, and on various occasions, that the States had no right to grant bank charters, and that the banking privilege belonged exclusively to the Federal Government. No direct attempt, however, had hitherto been made to deprive the States of that power, which they had long exercised unmolested. But now the attempt was to be made, if not in an open and unequivocal manner, at least in an indirect way, to strip the States of the power of chartering banks. At any rate, if it was intended that the provision did not go so far, it could not be denied that it interfered in the regulation which State Governments might have adopted for the government of those institutions, which was an odious exercise of power, not granted by the Constitution. In England, such a provision was never dreamed of; nor did he believe that, when the Constitution was framed, such an attribute was imagined by those who authorized the establishment of a bankrupt system."

In 1837, at the extra session of Congress, Mr. Van Buren, President of the United States, recommended to Congress the enactment of a bankrupt law exclusively applicable to banks. The honorable Senator from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY,) then chairman of the Judiciary Committee, prevailed upon the Senate to refer that portion of the Message to that committee. He retained the subject in his hands until the Senate was about to adjourn, and then moved to discharge the committee from the further consideration of it. All with whom I conversed commended his good sense and sound discretion; and I think very few would have consented to the passage of the law recommended.

I have heard no reason assigned here now, that did not exist then; and I shall, therefore, vote to exclude this amendment from the bill. But, sir, whilst I feel a great repugnance to this act, I shall acquiesce in the decision of the majority. I shall go, sir, all lengths for the relief of that unfortunate class who can get no relief except from Congress. And I now publicly proclaim, that, after full and deliberate consultation with many friends, I have resolved to vote for any bill for the relief of voluntary bankrupts, although it may include involuntary and corporations. I shall have discharged my duty by endeavoring, in every stage of its progress through the Senate, to exclude State institutions; but if, notwithstanding all this, a majority shall include them, I will vote for the bill, and leave the responsibility where it properly belongs.

Sir, I am rejoiced to perceive that, during this discussion, thus far, no party considerations have intruded themselves upon us. I trust we shall continue to be exempted from them. The subject is too sacred, the ground on which we stand is too holy, to be polluted by such unbidden footsteps. Let us, then, soar above the foul atmosphere of party, and breathe the pure air of justice and humanity. Thousands and thousands are now watching, with the most anxious solicitude, the result of your deliberations. Upon your action is suspended the fate of hundreds of thousands of your fellow-citizens, including every age, sex, and condition. It is not the business-man alone that has felt the desolating fury of the storm, which has swept like a tornado over our once happy land. The old and young have also shared its withering influence; and now, from lisping infancy to tottering age, an appeal is made to your humanity, enough to penetrate even hearts of stone. Shall it go unanswered? Will you permit the unwelcome memory of the past, and the blighted hopes of the future, to hurry their victims to despair? Many have already gone beyond your sympathy. Prostrated, ruined, broken-hearted, desperate from "hope deferred," they have reached

"The undiscovered country, from whose bourne
No traveller returns."

But you have it in your power to minister consolation to those that still survive. Save, then, I beseech you—save the energetic, the enterprising man, on whose future exertions and acquisitions depends the support of aged parents and tender offspring. Let him not be compelled to flee from his country and his home, as Æneas fled from the flames of Troy, with old Anchises on his shoulders, and young Iulus by his side. Place him once more in a condition to aid his country in its onward march to prosperity and greatness. This can be done by your favorable action on the measure now before you. In it are involved the dearest domestic relations, as well as the most important public interests. In your hands is the issue of happiness or of misery to thousands of your fellow-beings. I trust you will so dispose of it, that the cause of humanity will be promoted by the discharge of a constitutional duty.

SPEECH OF MR. HENDERSON, OF MISSISSIPPI,

In Senate, March 16, 1840—On the survey and defence on the coast of Mississippi, &c.

Mr. HENDERSON rose and said: I am charged, Mr. President with the presentation of a memorial from the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, seeking from Congress a survey of the coast and bays, sounds and harbors, within and adjacent to their State, to the end and purpose of making such naval establishments and fortifications there as shall subserve the protection of the ports and commerce connected with these waters. Of so much moment do I deem the objects contemplated by this memorial, that I should not consider my agency properly discharged by a silent reference of this important paper. I must therefore claim the indulgence of the Senate while I shall briefly attempt to give some faint impression of the magnitude of the subject to which it refers. And in doing this, I shall note the necessity also of a naval depot and navy yard in the same connection.

These waters, which the memorialists suppose to be the duty of this Government to place within its exclusive command, constitute a large bay of the Gulf of Mexico, usually known at Lake Borgne, and lies between the southern shore of the State of Mississippi and that portion of Louisiana that stretches down into the Gulf on the north side of the Mississippi river. This bay present a very tolerable roadstead and anchorage ground for large ships when, entered westwardly, they shall have passed a line drawn from the eastern boundary of the State of Mississippi, across the most western portion of the Chandeleur Islands, and under shelter of which islands the most ample security is obtained. But the harbor is considered to improve in its approach to Ship Island at the western extremity of which, and thence to on to Cat Island, the anchorage is known to be good, the waters of sufficient depth, and, in the judgment of experienced mariners, the harbors so land-locked as to furnish safe and ample shelter for any size and number of shipping. It is likewise a well-attested truth, as set forth by the memorialists, that these islands and the adjacent shores are proverbial for their healthfulness. And another fact of general notoriety, and partly authenticated by the reservations made in your land office, is, that all the hammocks surrounding the shore and bordering upon the rivers and bayous empting into this bay, are covered or skirted with live oak timber—whilst the Pearl and Pascagoula rivers, with other adjacent countries and water courses, furnish white oak, cypress, yellow pine, and other timbers, of the best quality and in exhaustless abundance. The fitness of this bay for a ship yard and naval station is further sustained from its convenient supply of hemp, cordage, and iron from Kentucky and Tennessee, lead and copper from Missouri, tar and rosin from the adjacent shore, and provision supplies from the great garner of the West. Without local partiality or invidious comparisons, therefore, I assume the fact, and challenge any scrutiny of estimates involved in the assertion, that there is no point on our marine border susceptible of such an establishment where it can be as well and cheaply supplied as the place referred to.

In designating the Ship Island or its vicinage as the place of probable preference, I wish the Senate to understand that, beside its local incidents and advantages, is relative position is such that it can command all necessary participation in the products and resources of the Mississippi Valey almost as conveniently, and as securely from interruption by an enemy on the coast, as if its locality was upon the river. Distant from New Orleans about sixty miles, its connection with the river through that city is an inland water-communication nearly to the river bank, and which a fortified command of the islands of this bay wholly protects, and, by re opening the ancient and long established navigation of the bayou Manshac, a direct intercourse is at once opened above the island of Orleans to the Mississippi river, which is equally inland, and alike protected by the same fortifications. This connection cannot be extended to any other sufficient harbor on the Gulf of Mexico. Any other place which can claim pretensions worth naming, must find its intercourse with the Mississippi partly by land, or an exposure to see in some extent must be encountered. To furnish the essential supplies of of such an establishment by land would be impolitic, if not impracticable; and if dependent for its supplies by sea, it is manifest that, in time of war, with an enemy upon the coast, these supplies would be transmitted at such hazard as a state of war might present. In view of this subject, I shall pass with slight notice, and as having no material influence upon the question, the establishment which this Government has deemed fit and proper to make at Pensacola. Its value and importance is, perhaps, better known to our Navy Commissioners than to the public at large. But I presume it may be said, without inviting much contradiction, that this establishment can never furnish any direct and essential protection to Mobile and New Orleans, where the whole commerce of the Southwest concentrates, and our great interests are first exposed. It will be seen from the maps, also, that the bay of Borgne is the only inlet for a thousand miles of the coast where a ship of the line can find a harbor. And to this consideration may be added another of vital moment, derived from the modern application of steam to vessels of war, which, from the ease and celerity of their movements, must materially aggravate our exposed condition on this bay. I cannot suppose, therefore, that any intelligent mind will doubt, if this bay is suitably susceptible of such establishments and naval defences, that sufficient reasons have been urged to show the propriety of speedily adopting such measures as shall effect the objects in their fullest extent.

In further proof of the capacity and importance of this bay, it may be well to call the recollections of the Senate to a portion of its marine history and naval statistics.

A few ineffectual attempts at discovery and conquest on the coast of Florida were made by the French in the fifteenth century; but, expelled from the shore by their Spanish neighbors, whom they found there before them, no similar enterprise on the Gulf of Mexico was attemped by them for more than a century and a half afterward. And the fact is strange and remarkable, that the Spaniards, who, for so long a time had permanent possession of Florida on the one side, and Mexico on the other, should have so long failed to discover and possess themselves of the country including the mouth and valley of the Mississippi river, till superseded in that discovery and possession by the French, one hundred and fifty years subsequent to the occupation of Florida. The French first discovered the Misisssippi in excursions from their colony in the North, from whence the enterprising La Salle, committing himself to its current, arrived at its mouth on the 7th of April, 1681. Returning to France, he from thence sailed on an expedition to enter the river from the sea. But, missing the object of his search, he coasted the shore of Texas, made land at Bernard's bay, established himself transiently on the Colorado, and, after many fruitless efforts to find the mouth of the river by water, determined on seeking its shores by land; and, in prosecution of this purpose, journeyed through the wilderness to the western branch of the Trinity river, and was there betrayed and assassinated on the 19th of March, 1687.

Twelve years afterward, Iberville, in execution of La Salle's plan of colonizing the Lower Mississippi, sailed from France with four vessels, two of which were thirty-gun frigates. Arriving at Pensacola, he found that place in possession of Spain, and passing thence; came next to Dauphin island near the mouth of the Mobile bay, and thence to Hom and Ship and Chandeleur islands; and so terminated his voyage in the bay of Borgne. After a brief exploration of the islands, passes, and shores, Ship island became the place of first settlement to the emigrants. From this island Iberville put forth in his boats in search of the mouth of the Mississippi—succeeded on the third day out—ascended the river to Point Coupee, and thence descending to the Manshac, passed through this bayou, the lakes Maurapas and Pontchartrain, by way of the Rigolettes, to the bay of St. Louis, and thence on to Ship island. Thus in a few days from the time the silence of this bay was first disturbed by the voice and action of civilized man, was its outlets and connections practically surveyed and ascertained. After this survey, the French colonial head-quarters were established on shore to the east side of the bay of Biloxi, about twelve miles from Ship island, where a fort of considerable strength was completed by the 1st of May, 1699. On the 7th of December next following another French squadron arrived at Ship island, consisting of one fifty and one forty gun ship. And in the spring of the year 1700, a Spanish ship of thirty guns came there from Pensacola to expel the French from the island, but, finding the force of the latter so formidable, was compelled to withdraw. From their possessions here, the French settled Natchez in 1700, and Mobile in 1702, and other adjacent places. In occupation of this bay, the French had established defences and settlements on Dauphin, Chandeleur, Ship, and Cat islands, though their principal naval establishment was at Ship island, where their transports and vessels of war appear to have made their usual harbor. At this period and so long as the French retained the colony, all the commerce of Louisiana came into this bay, and was from thence distributed to New Orleans (after its settlement in 1718) by way of the bayou St. John, and though the lakes and bayou Manshac to the Upper Mississippi. The Mississippi near its mouth was fortified in the first settlement of the colony, though but little use was ever made by the French of this part of its navigation. Perceiving the bay of Borgne to be a more accessible inlet, and the only harbor for the larger vessels of their navy, they yielded their convictions to the necessity and propriety of protecting the colony and its commerce by a decided command and defence of this bay. And this Government will be constrained to acknowledge the same necessity when the interests now at stake there shall be deemed of sufficient consequence to be protected at all. Beside the naval station of the colonists at Ship island, it became a commercial depot for merchant vessels, at which the proprietors of the province in 1720 established a store-house for the reception of imported goods and country produce.

Such were the uses and capacities of this bay in the estimation of the French till the treaty of Paris in 1763, when the entire province passed under the dominion of Spain. Under the latter power its consideration somewhat diminished, though it continued a principal thoroughfare of commerce till after its acquisition by the United States in 1803. Surveys and charts were successively made of these waters by the French, Spanish, and English. And it is worth remarking, that with the frequent storms that sweep over this Southern region, the provincial history, so far as known to me, has recorded but two instances of stranding or shipwreck on this bay.

The further evidence of the capacity and importance of this bay as a naval station, and since it became a part of these United States, is of much more interesting and difinite character. A part of it stands out in bold relief in our country's history. It is seen in the perilous disasters which threatened us in the late war with Great Britain, when this bay was in the indisputed occupation of the enemy's fleet, freighted with a numerons soldiery invited to the conquest of the crescent city, and stimulated to achieve success by the tempting reward of "beauty and booty." It is probably now a matter beyond controversy, that had the islands of this bay been judiciously fortified, and suitably sustained by a moderate naval armament, the enemy would have been excluded from their quiet anchorage and convenient access to our shores, and the perils of an invasion saved to our country.

In the war of 1814, we had five gun-boats on this bay, (a stronger defence than is now there,) with a small naval storehouse on shore at the Bay of St. Louis. On the 14th of November, 1814, the British fleet of sixty sail were distributed throughout the bay, near on to the east mouth of Pearl river. Our gun-boats, after all the resistence they could oppose to such a force, surrendered to the foe, the naval stores on shore were burned, and an historian of the time has said, "that the enemy, thus left complete master on the lakes to the east of the island on which the city of New Orleans stands, gave him the facility of reaching it by any of the waters running easterly to any of these lakes. The crisis appeared really alarming." And, with such admonitions of experience, does it not import a reprehensible delinquency somewhere, that, for all this Government has done to prevent it, an enemy might import the same alarm to-morrow by sailing into possession of this bay, with even less resistance than the five gun-boats presented last war.

The last evidence I shall notice on this part of the subject is a survey of these waters by John Wheeler, esq. during the summer of 1839, in conformity with a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, to give assurance to its citizens of the fitness of this bay for a seaport to our State. The enterprise of establishing such a seaport had been previously commenced, and prosecuted to some extent in the immature pretensions of the "Mississippi city." This city is located on on the shore opposite to Ship island, and near the place which the French named "New Boloxi," and to which they transferred their stores and barracks from the fort "St. Louis," on the east side of the Bay of Boloxi, in the year 1720. This survey and report having been reprinted here, are both upon our tables, and to which I hope Senators will give some attention. Made with little preparation, by simple means and in a short space of time, it makes no pretensions to be a minute and general survey of this inland sea, but only to trace the soundings of a few channels and anchorage grounds to ascertain the principal matter in which the State had peculiar interest. On this point the report is clear and satisfactory. And, besides supplying important evidence in behalf of the subject now commended to the consideration of Congress, it furnishes a becoming introduction to the further execution of the objects sought.

Having said thus much, chiefly on the local capacities and characteristics of this bay, I must be permitted to note more particularly the national importance of the objects contemplated by this memorial. And, impressed as I am with its volume of magnitude, it is to me matter of profound astonishment that, with the loud speaking incidents of the late war still sounding in our ears; with the map of our coast south of Cape Florida before us; with the computations of our swelling commerce as it here pours out upon the world from fifteen States and Territories, annually reported and annually surprising us by its increase; that the vast interests these objects involve have been so long suffered to slumber in neglected repose. Whence so long the absence of that watchful and virtuous jealousy of the States most directly interested? And whence the justice and policy of this Government, that has expended on each of several States upon the Atlantic in marine and naval defences more than is expended on this section of the seaboard, where disembogues two thirds of the nation's exports? This memorial, in my apprehension of it, ought not to be regarded as the memorial only of the State of Mississippi. It more emphatically consults the highest interests of Alabama and Louisiana, and with them the great and mutual interests of Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Arkansas, Virginia, and Pennsylvania. To furnish every permanent protection by fortresses which this Southern outlet will admit of, and aid these by a proportional assignment to these seas at all times of the ships of war in commission, and to sustain both by a naval depot and navy yard, is, in my judgment, the palpable duty of this Government; and the States most interested should so require it. I know exceptions are taken to the insalubrity of the climate. But we who live there know these objections have but slight foundation in truth. And, true or false, the great and tempting interests always at stake there, whenever danger assails our country from a foreign foe, cannot dispense with any less continued and permanent protection, however great the costs, than is afforded to the most favored of the Atlantic States.

While Louisiana was under the dominion of Spain, from 1795 till 1803, all know with how much earnest consideration a commercial outlet for the infant West, by the Mississippi, was then regarded. The statesmen of that day, duly estimating the growing importance of the Great Valley, and the rights of its citizens, were sensitively alive to the necesssity of possessing a commercial emporium at its southern extremity. The treaty of 1803 consummated that desirable object. It may perhaps give some additional force to his appeal to note the amount of exports from New Orleans, of both Spanish and American growth, in 1803, it contrast with that to which it has since attained. I present the comparison in round numbers, but as substantially correct.

	Exports in 1803.
Cotton,	34,000 bales,	since augmented to	737,000
Sugar,	4,000 hogsheads,	do.	30,000
Molasses,	800 do.	do.	20,000
Tobacco,	2,000 do.	do.	44,000
Beef and Pork,	3,000 barrels,	since equal to	350,000
Flour,	50,000 do.	do.	436,000

The foregoing were the principal articles of export at that time, and such their disparity with the present. But the products of the West that now pass through this port, in hemp-stuffs, whiskey, lard, corn, staves, copper, lead, &c. constitute an immense aggregate almost unknown to the commerce of that day. And, in addition to all this, the export of Mobile, which was then nothing, and now great, should be taken into the account, so far as the object of this computation is concerned. If then the acquisition of Louisiana, from commercial considerations, was a desirable object in 1803, are not the advanced interests to which it has since attained, and the vastly greater to which it shall attain, worth the protecting care of this Government? And yet Mobile and New Orleans are essentially without any marine protection against a sudden invasion. Nature has guarded the entrance into the Mississippi river against all vessels drawing over fifteen feet water; and the naval establishment at Pensacola may answer some convenient resort to our smaller sized ships when cruising on that station. But, these matters aside, whilst the Bay of Borgne is without forts, depots, and naval protection, and whilst an enemy's fleet may at any time take undisputed command of its islands harbors, and New Orleans and Mobile, with their tempting treasures, can never be reasonably safe against the sudden intrusions of a hostile power. Whilst an enemy commands this bay, New Orleans and Mobile are more remote from each other, for all purposes of commercial or military intercourse, than New Orleans and Pittsburgh—but this interchange is daily, whilst the command of the bay is retained to us; and its interruption also suspends all communication by the great Southern mail route between these cities. These considerations must sufficiently disclose the deep and equal interests which the States of Alabama and Louisiana have at stake in the measures proposed.

The State of Mississippi, though less exposed to injury from invasion at this vulnerable point than either of her adjacent sisters, feels, nevertheless, a lively solicitude on the subjects of this memorial. There intervenes between the sea-shore and the cotton growing regions of Mississippi a pine-woods country of about one hundred miles in width. This country, as its forest growth implies, is generally poor in soil and sparsely populated, the larger portion of the territory being yet public lands. The river Pearl and Pascagoula have their rise in the margin of the cotton-growing districts, course their way through this pine-woods country, and fall into the bay of Borgne, each about thirty-five miles (and on opposite sides) from Ship island. These rivers are proven to be navigable, for ordinary sized steamboats, up to the neighborhood of the cotton lands a great part of the year. But time has rendered their navigation dangerous from the numerous trunks of trees it has planted in their channels. There are also a few bars, readily susceptible of improvement, that now interpose some obstacles. The limited resources of the few inhabitants residing near the shores of these rivers have not heretofore enabled them, nor will they probably be soon enabled, to concentrate a sufficient interest to remove these obstructions. These people believe, as I most verily do, and as I hope Congress will yet believe that the Government, owning most of the lands in this region, should appropriate a portion of them, sufficient for the purpose of rendering safe and successful the navigation of these rivers. But, intending no dissertation on this subject at this time, I will proceed to observe that this wide forest of pine woods and public domain has heretofore kept the populous portions of the State of Mississippi from intercourse and familiar acquaintance with her own sea-shore, and, of course, prevented their enjoyment of all commercial privileges in this quarter. The survey of Mr. Wheeler, before referred to, is evidence of their awakened attention to this subject. But, while they have thus learned the harbor privileges which Nature has here provided for them, they are admonished of the neglect of this Government, by which every commercial enterprise at this point would be exposed to much hazard. From such apprehensions of peril to themselves, and to the Southwest generally, they invoke your protection. Isolated, too, at this portion of the State of Mississippi is, from the interior, it may be fairly urged as of national importance that every proper encouragement should be given to facilitate intercourse between the populous portions of the State and this sea shore, both by land and water, and thus facilitate the means by which her citizen soldiers shall have speedy access to this point, which must ever be an important one, from which to rally in action with their brethren of Alabama and Louisiana to repel an invading foe.

Such, Mr. President, I conceive are the views of the memorialists, and such are the views and sentiments which I entertain of those matters for which I am desirous to engage your favorable consideration. And, so strongly am I impressed with the force with which the subjects, rather than my commendation of them, must appeal to your approbation, that I will not permit myself to doubt they can receive less than a favorable action at your hands.

SPEECH OF MR. DIXON,

OF RHODE ISLAND,

In Senate, May 20, 1840—On the Bankrupt bill.

Mr. PRESIDENT: The honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. NORVELL,] who was entitled to the floor, having signified his pleasure of yielding the privilege to any one disposed to address the Senate, I will avail myself of the opportunity to submit a few remarks on the important subject before us. This I will do, sir, notwithstanding the able manner in which the subject has already been discussed, and notwithstanding the expectation that many learned and experienced Senators are yet to speak, who will doubtless impart all the information which the debate is calculated to elicit. For, sir, this subject brings with it peculiar claims for general and thorough discussion; and, not being identified with any of the party divisions of our country, its destiny is not likely to be controlled by any of their relations. It seems to depend more on the frank development and comparison of views of those who come from different sections of the country, and who have taken pains to consider the probable, general, and relative effects of a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the country, should one be established. It therefore becomes all who have a voice in Congressional legislation to mingle in this interchange of views, that those throughout our extended country who now watch the progress of this measure with such intense anxiety may be enabled to decide whether hope on this subject is entirely extinguished, or only deferred; whether it will be worth their while, in case the present effort fails, to invoke the future for a more propitious result; or whether, under the influence of blighted hopes, to yield in silent despair to the pressure of their misfortunes, that Congress may no longer be annoyed by the lamentations of distress, or haunted by the fallen victims of adventurous enterprise.

More than half a century has rolled away since the Constitution of the Federal Government delegated to Congress the power of establishing uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States. That power has been exercised but in a solitary instance, and in that instance but a short period of time. For nearly forty years it has slumbered on the cold page that records it. These facts naturally present two questions to the mind—

1st. What was the object of that delegation of power? and

2d. What has caused this forbearance of its exercise?

The object, sir, was the relief of the unfortunate, the virtuous, the industrious, and the prudent, who might be reduced by misfortune to insolvency. Such a power, sir, must exist somewhere in every Government for the redemption of the sons of adversity; for those who thus by misfortune are overwhelmed with debts beyond their means of payment. The exertion of this power, I admit, is among the highest exercises of sovereignty. It should be delegated with caution, and exercised in sound discretion. But there are necessities which demand its exercise, and without it a country would often be disgraced by its own scenes of oppression. Where could such a power be vested in this great country so safe and so available to all its contemplated purposes as in the Congress of the United States—as with the Representatives of the whole people, who legislate for the common welfare of the whole country, and who alone can give uniformity to measures of general interest?

It was at once seen by those who formed the Constitution that this great and overruling power, which impairs or dissolves at will the solemn obligations of men, could have no other safe and useful depository. The local jurisdiction of State Governments would be inadequate to its general purposes. Hence it was withdrawn from them, while Congress, from its general powers, as well as its universal relations and sympathies with the general Confederacy, could much better administer to its occasions, and hence the power was conferred upon it.

This power, sir, is, and always has been, among the incidents of sovereignty. It has always been exercised by sovereignty, and always will be, whether that sovereignty resides in the will of the king or in the people.

The framers of the Constitution, while they contemplated the splendid results of commerce, were not unmindful that adversity and disaster sometimes mingle in its train; that while it might advance national prosperity, and confer the splendor of opulence on thousands, it might not be without its victims; that while it might raise some to the lofty heights of independence, it might sink others to the depths of poverty; that not only those immediately engaged in the great operations of trade, but many indirectly connected, might be involved in a common fate. Hence it was deemed but equal justice that all meritorious individuals, who were overtaken by the adversities of life, even in the shade of retirement, as well as those who suffer disaster in the course of business, should, on surrendering their property to their creditors, be allowed the same refuge, without regard to profession or calling. It is true that trade is, of all the avocations of life, the most likely to need the interposition of this extraordinary power. It is in its vicissitudes the most powerful agent in making its votaries rich or poor. But in a country like this, where men so indiscriminately apply themselves to physical and mental labor, and where traffic and trade seem to be the incidents of all, it would be difficult to classify, and unjust to discriminate between, the occupations of men, in extending the benefits of a bankrupt law. It cannot be denied, however, that a prominent and leading object of that delegation of power was the relief of fallen adventurers in trade, who, on becoming insolvent, would surrender their property to their creditors, for the purpose of being discharged. Yet no inference is warranted that the same relief could not be extended to other classes of men. All the limitations and restrictions of that power are to be found in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution. Its own words afford its best exposition; and inasmuch as we there find one limitation expressed, it is reasonable to infer that no others were intended. Its exercise is there limited and defined, as far as was deemed necessary. The laws on the subject of bankruptcies are to be uniform throughout the United States. But who are to be embraced in those laws, and what are to be their provisions, depends entirely on the will of Congress, provided due regard be had to the uniformity prescribed. No other limitations are expressed, and if they are implied, they are such, and such only, as are incident to the powers of legislation, and such as the condition of our country and its exigencies may from time to time enjoin upon the exercise of that power, independent of foreign notions or foreign policy. This uniformity was deemed indispensable to the useful exercise of this power, and hence we find it associated in the Constitution with the great interests of the country that require the same uniformity. It stands side by side with the provisions regulating the great interests of commerce—interests not to be sustained without the same uniformity of laws; and owing to the want of which, the old confederation was found entirely inadequate to all its purposes, and but for the imposing necessity of uniform laws in the regulation of commerce, the present Constitution might never have been adopted.

It has been said by the honorable chairman, [Mr. WALL,] that the expression bankrupt laws, used in our Constitution, compares with expressions which, in England, had received a settled and well-known technical signification at the time when the Constitution was framed, and that, by adopting the expressions, the construction was also adopted, that we are to look to the bankrupt laws of that day in England, in order to define this power in our Constitution. But, sir, the bankrupt system of England would afford but very equivocal rules for that purpose. The most striking characteristic of that system is its diversities and discrepancies, under different laws, and during the different periods of its history. Its limitations and enlargements, its severities and its mitigations of penalties, have shown themselves in all the varieties of change, and have evinced no other standard of consistency than the will of the kingdom. The system has been changing from the Cessio Bonorum of the civil law, through all the dynasties of power, down to the 6th of George IV. At the time this power was conferred by the Constitution, other nations than Great Britain had bankrupt laws, though not all after the same model, but varying according to circumstances. Those were, doubtless, within the knowledge of the delegates of the convention, and, for aught that appears, were referred to, if reference was necessary, for either precedent or principle in deciding the point before them.

But that delegation of power contemplated the establishment of such laws on the subject of bankruptcies as would in future be required in the progress of this country for the relief of insolvent debtors here, and in such manner as would best comport with the necessities and merits of the insolvent, the course of business, the situation, and policy of the country. The convention might have delegated other powers for the establishment of uniform laws on other subjects than bankruptcies. Suppose it had conferred on Congress the power of establishing uniform settlement laws throughout the United States, could it be said that the settlement laws of England, at that time, would afford any controlling standard for settlement laws for this country? Suppose there had been in that convention some delegate who fondly cherished the idea of permanent property in wild beasts; yes, sir, some venerable Nimrod, who had proposed to confer on Congress the power of establishing uniform game laws throughout the United States, and that provision had been sanctioned, would it follow as a matter of course that, if any such laws were to be enacted here, they must be made conformable to the game laws of England at that time, and that they must embrace exactly the same species of game? No, sir. And, besides, our parks, forests, and manors would be found so unlike those of England, as to require different provisions. And it might be thought humane, at least, to mitigate the severity of penalties for the punishment of those game laws of offenders denominated in the English law poachers. And for the same reason that other laws are to be adapted to our condition, Congress is at liberty to pass just such uniform bankrupt laws as the exigencies of our country may require, extending them to all persons whose broken fortunes may involve the exercise of this great principle of humanity.

But, sir, why has not this power been more frequently exercised? One reason is: those mistaken analogies which have been so often run between the bankrupt laws of England and those which Congress is authorized to establish here, are calculated to produce strong aversion to the power itself. Hence this jealousy which a reference to the bankrupt laws of England has always awakened, and which first manifested itself in the Convention that formed the Constitution. Roger Sherman, a distinguished delegate from Connecticut, objected to this delegation of power. He observed that bankruptcies were in some cases punished with death in England, and he did not choose to grant a power by which that might be done here. But Gouverneur Morris, another distinguished delegate from the State of Pennsylvania, observed that, extensive and delicate as the subject was, he would agree to it, because he saw no danger of its being abused by the Legislature of the United States. The power was conferred; one vote only against it, and that given by the delegate in behalf of Connecticut. If Roger Sherman could entertain those prejudices against this power, it is not strange that other minds should entertain them, and be equally influenced by them. Thus most of the objections that could be found or imagined against the English system have been infused into the idea of a bankrupt law for this country. Even the honorable chairman of the committee, [Mr. WALL,] with all his learning and experience, finds it difficult so to abstract himself from the British system as not to feel obliged to urge upon the consideration of others the bankrupt laws of England, as they existed at the formation of the Constitution, in evidence of what was meant and intended by the power delegated in that Constitution. Whereas the only analogy is in the name, except that it was intended here, as well as in England, that bankruptcy should be a title of property, by which property might be transferred by operation of law.

The limited intercourse between the States for years after the adoption of the Constitution was calculated to foster local feelings and views, and it would be among the natural suggestions of State jealousy that the exercise of this power (however desirable in some States, and especially with those the most commercial) might be prejudicial to others. Besides, the country was rather agricultural than commercial in its pursuits, bearing relations of life not the most likely to awaken strong and active sympathies in favor of the insolvent debtor.

This consideration naturally secured a preference for State insolvent laws, corresponding better, as might be thought, with the local concerns of the day. But the relations of business in this country (when not disturbed) are greatly changed and enlarged. The modern facilities of intercourse have brought all the States together into a common market. The North and South are in the constant interchange of their products and merchandise. This is calculated to give national uniformity to the rules of trade, and induces the necessity of uniformity in the treatment of the relation of debtor and creditor, and more especially when imperious necessity invokes interference with its existing obligations between individuals. But a still stronger reason is to be found in the experiment of a bankrupt law in 1800. That law, although it may have been enacted with great care, was not well adapted in its provisions for the commencement of the experiment. It was too complicated in its details, and too expensive in its operations. Before it could be well understood and brought into practical utility, many frauds were committed upon it, and it became unpopular. This afforded its enemies a triumph, and the law was repealed before a fair experiment was made. All the evils of the system were developed before its benefits could be realized. Like all new systems, its first operations served but to expose its imperfections. Had that law embraced nothing but the single principle of voluntary bankruptcy—been more simple in its provisions, and improved by legislative action, as its defects were discovered, the country would now have been blessed with all the benefits which its friends ever anticipated. Another reason, sir, why this power has been so sparingly exercised by Congress was well suggested by the honorable Senator from North Carolina (Mr. STRANGE) yesterday, that a bankrupt law is generally considered a provision in favor of the debtor against the creditor; and as debtors are generally the poor, and creditors the rich, the latter are more fully represented than the former, and of course have a preponderating influence. Legislation is always slow when its march is against the current of popular influence. But those reasons have many of them lost their force. The insolvent laws of the respective States are found to be inadequate to the relief required, and, if we are to judge from what we hear from every section of the country, and from every class of its citizens, we may suppose that the time will soon come when that dormant power in the Constitution will be roused to action. Continue the present pecuniary distress, and there will soon be a uniform sentiment in favor of a uniform system of its bankruptcy. Uniform pressure and distress throughout the country have, in some degree, overruled local objections and invidious feelings among different classes, and have invoked at last the only remedial power. Moved by this invocation, the Committee on the Judiciary have reported a bill, which is now before us.

That bill provides for the two great objects of a bankrupt system, as I understand it, in this country. 1st. The surrender of the insolvent debtor's property, to be divided among his creditors; and 2d. The discharge from all his debts due to those creditors. This bill is for voluntary bankruptcy only. It is plain in its principles and simple in its details, and to be administered in a cheap and speedy manner. To this bill there is an amendment offered by the minority of the committee, by which amendment another bill, containing different principles, is proposed to be substituted. To that substitute I am opposed. I object to two of its prominent features.

1st. To the principle of compulsory bankruptcy, which it contains.

2dly. To the principle which embraces corporations.

The principle of compulsory bankruptcy is not called for by the voice of the people, either the rich or poor, which has been so generally and so loudly expressed on this subject. It is not required in this country for the protection of the creditor. He has his remedy, to all intents and purposes, by civil process, for the collection of his debts. It is within the province of the State Governments so to extend that process, and provide such remedies at pleasure, as to subserve all the purposes of collection, and afford to the creditor a cheaper as well as a more summary and a more certain system of collection than can be afforded by any bankrupt law. Yes, Mr. President, the creditor can in this way reach the last dollar of his debtor. He can strip him of all his property and turn him naked upon the world. What more does he want? Bankrupt laws, I repeat, Mr. President, are necessary for the debtor only, by which he may be enabled honestly to surrender his property to his creditors, and take his discharge. This can only be effected through the medium of a bankrupt law. An arrangement may sometimes be brought about by compromise between debtor and creditor, and I have found in most cases that creditors, especially those of commercial pursuits, are favorably disposed to compromise. If all creditors were actuated by the same liberal and prudential motives, there would be no necessity for a bankrupt law. But, sir, it does so happen, that in many, if not in most of those cases, there is some one of more stern and inexorable spirit of exaction—some Shylock who will exact the bond—who will insist, not only on the flesh, but on the blood. For these reasons, without a bankrupt law, the insolvent debtor can effect no composition, and, instead of distributing his property and taking his discharge, must hold on, consume what he has, or starve, and the creditor thus loses his debt.

But, sir, this compulsory principle in the bill is peculiarly objectionable at the present time of monetary distress. While it might have the semblance of conferring rights on creditors, it would expose to the process of bankruptcy thousands of our solvent business men, and even some of the wealthy. Consider for a moment its operation on that class which the bill denominates "merchants," or those actually using the trade of merchandise, or seeking their living by buying and selling, etc. owing $; and consider what may be their fate upon the happening of any of those equivocal acts which the bill sets down as acts of bankruptcy, and which jealousy or malice, by false construction, may bring within the law. This class of the trading community are not peculiar to any section of the country. They are found in the North and in the South, in the East and in the West. Some have large amounts in goods on hand, on which they have made large advancements, to sustain the operations of the manufacturer. Some have advanced largely on the great staples of the country, to save the producing classes from suspension of their labors. Are those men to be thus exposed to commissions of bankruptcy? No, sir; let them alone, and they will pay their debts. But, for the present, they are deprived of their ordinary means—they are straitened and embarrassed. Yes, sir, many of them are on the brink of ruin, and the least jostle from a bankrupt law might plunge them down the precipice. Perhaps this compulsory principle in the bill might not be exerted against that class which I have alluded to, and the best hope derivable from that consideration, is the infrequency of its use, even where it is provided for in the English bankrupt laws. It has, I admit, in a great degree, gone into disuse. It may be retained in all the bankrupt laws in the world, for aught I know. It is rarely used, however, but at the instance of the debtor, except in some few cases, where extreme jealousy or malignant feeling prompts the creditor to action. Hence we see that this principle may very well be dispensed with.

Allow me now, Mr. President, to call the attention of the Senate to the second and still more objectionable provision—I mean that of including corporations in the bill—a provision so impracticable and absurd, when viewed in this connection, that I should think it required only to be mentioned to be rejected. If it involves a necessary principle of a bankrupt law, I should like to see its details fully carried out. Its provisions in the present bill only lead to difficulties, without remedying them. It provides for the seizure of corporation property, without prescribing rules for its sequestration, or winding up the concerns of the corporation. It provides for no security or disposition of the surplus that may remain after paying off the debts of the corporation. Yet, it cannot be doubted that many, and probably nearly all that may be made liable to this bankrupt process will be found solvent; many of them with large surplus balances, although they may not be able to pay all their debts in the short space of fifteen days, as required by this bill. Yes, Mr. President, millions on million would go into the hands of assignees beyond the amount of their liabilities. What security is provided for this property? I answer, none; and it would be difficult to provide adequate security. The creditor or creditors having debts to the amount of $500, when they commence this bankrupt process, give a bond, but what is the object of that bond? The petitioner, at the time of presenting the petition, is to deliver to the court a bond, with surety, to the corporation, in such penalty as the court shall require, conditioned to prosecute said bankrupt proceedings to effect, to establish the debt or debts due to the crediditors, and the act of bankruptcy charged against the bankrupt, according to the provisions of the act. These two conditions are all the bond relates to. The debts may be easily proved, and then, to save the penalty of the bond, only one thing more is to be proved, and that is, that the corporation has suspended or stopped payment for the space of fifteen days, and that will, doubtless, be matter of notoriety: for, I ask, what manufacturing corporation throughout the whole country has not already been guilty of that delinquency; and what one will have exemption from it in future? I refer more particularly to manufacturing corporations, because they, more than others, have fallen under my own observation; and yet I know the corporators to be composed of our most wealthy and substantial inhabitants, rich in every thing but money, with large stocks of goods on hand, which have accumulated from mere want of a market, and hence this want of money.

Now, sir, by this bill, if one of their five hundred dollar notes lies over at bank fifteen days, or one of their debts of that amount is presented, and not paid within the same time, they are at once to be declared bankrupt, and stripped of all their property. What large manufacturing corporation, I ask, can be found in this whole country that would not fall under this condemnation? Let it not be said that there will be a general forbearance—that those violations of punctuality will be overlooked—and that an indulgent spirit will prevent any rigid application of the law. If so, there is no necessity for the provision that can justify the experiment. Creditors are generally anxious to gather in their debts, and more particularly so when it seems most difficult for their debtors to pay: they would sue oftener, were it not for the expense and the delays of the law. But this would be to creditors a very cheap, and apparently very speedy remedy; and it would be used. This would destroy what little of confidence yet remains. Every man having a debt against a corporation would crowd for payment, before its whole effects were swept into the vortex which this bill provides for. Of course, every corporation, to avoid that peril, would have either to break up, and resort to such expedients as they might deem their own safety to require, or suffer themselves to be broken up by the operation of the law, and, in the latter event, let us see what would be the situation of the country about them. Five hundred dollar debts would be presented to corporations, and fifteen days' default of payment would follow, which would end in exposure to a commission of bankruptcy—a commission that would sweep all their effects into the hands of assignees, and of course there would be an end of all the incorporated manufacturing establishments of the country; for it is not to be expected that assignees would carry on those works. I am aware, sir, that the manufacturing establishments are not all incorporated, and of course would not all be subjected to this law. But there are so many of them incorporated, and with such amount of capital, that the effect which this law would have upon manufacturing establishments may be spoken of in general terms. Besides, the unincorporated establishments are mostly owned by that class of citizens who may be declared bankrupts under the compulsory principle of this bill.

But pass this bill including corporations, what would be its immediate effects on trade in their vicinity? Who could sell domestic goods, or any other property belonging to corporations? The general belief that all the effects of corporations would soon be under the hammer would prevent private sales; all would be in reserve for the occasions that would present bargains at public auctions, and those public auctions would come. Yes, sir, they would come. What splendid advertisements you would see posted up in all public places through the country, signed by assignees, and offering for sale domestic goods of all kinds—machinery, new and old, with preparations and fixtures—mills, dams, and canals, with steam power, hydraulic power, et cetera! But, after all, who would be the competitors at those auctions? The withdrawal of the currency has left penniless that class of traders who watch those money making opportunities. Hard money can scarcely subserve the purposes of daily marketing, credit is out of the question, and paper money will soon be no more, for the banks are to be struck down by the same blow. It would have been at least kind, and, I think, judicious, to have spared the banks for the present, and disposed of other corporations first, so that there might be bank bills, poor as they are, to purchase the manufacturing establishments with. No, sir, our own citizens would not be able to compete at those sales, although prices might be little more than nominal. Foreigners might buy in, and largely two, for there is yet money in Europe; and those foreigners, after purchasing, might run those establishments, or destroy them, as would best subserve their purposes, in furnishing us with goods. This investment of foreign capital, however, might cut off one source of our troubles. It might supersede the necessity of that perplexing exercise of legislation—the revision of the tariff of duties.

But, sir, the banks! The banks could not be overlooked in forming this bankrupt bill: and in the fulfilment of its provisions, not one of them, from Maine to Georgia, will be able to stand against its destroying operations. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER,) from his recent remarks here, seems not so much alarmed on account of the banks in his own State, as for others. Now, I entertain not the least doubt of their soundness and their strength. But, sir, let not those banks console themselves in their own strength; it will afford them no safety. Nothing is so strong but it may be broken. I doubt not but most of the banks throughout the country are solvent. But their customers are embarrassed under the general derangement of business, and cannot pay them, and of course they cannot pay all their debts and redeem all their bills within the limited time prescribed by this bill. They will be called upon, and a rigid execution of the law will level them, and equalize, without improving, the currency. Can any man suppose they will not be called upon? If you had, sir, the bills of any bank, even of Massachusetts, upon the passing of this law, would you not send those bills to the bank, or, through some agent, put them on their passage home, fearing that something might happen to that institution? And would not all holders of bank bills do the same? Would not this law destroy confidence? And what is there to keep bills in circulation after confidence is destroyed? Nothing, sir; and it is a waste of words to say that they would not be sent home. Now, where is the bank in business that has not more bills in circulation, and many more, than specie in its vaults? How are they to redeem? Bills and drafts on other banks would not be acceptable, and calling on their customers for payment would be an unavailing requisition. All the banks which have now suspended specie payments would certainly fall under the penalties of this bill: for none can suppose they could resume in fifteen days after the law should go into operation. And what follows? $500 of their debts are presented. They are held to strict compliance; for they do not seem to be the objects of grace, or even of common charity. All they can hope for is the protection of the law. Hence you will see all the effects of banks that do not pay their debts in the short period of fifteen days, in the hands of assignees; and what will those effects amount to, over and above their liabilities? I answer, millions on millions. And what is to be done with all that amount of property? for I have already shown that there is no security to be provided for it. All goes into the hands of irresponsible assignees. No provision for the return of surplus; and it might be somewhat difficult to determine to whom the reversionary interest might pertain. The banks having departed their artificial life intestate, and without heirs, would it escheat according to any of the rules of the feudal law, or would it abide with the assignees? If the latter, it would in some cases be a most enticing perquisite of office.

I do not contend, Mr. President, that banks, or any other corporations, ought to be held beyond the reach of laws. I mean, only, that they should be amenable to such, and such only, as are applicable to their nature and consistency; that they should be left to the legislative action and judicial decisions of the Governments that incorporate them—left in the hands of their creators—to be dealt with by the powers that sustain them, and held to those rules of action prescribed to them in their charters. Are they not so governed in the respective States by those who are their constitutional supervisors? Can they resist the sovereign will, when constitutionally exercised, of the States that have founded them? Have not the States, in the first place, the right to incorporate them? Have they not the wisdom to discern, and the power to remedy any evils resulting from the exercise of that policy? Those corporations must pay their debts and perform their other contracts according to the notions of good faith which those State sovereignties entertain and act upon. Their effects are liable to civil process in payment of their debts. The banks are visited and controlled by commissioners, in most of the States, appointed for that purpose. Their concerns are reached by the searching operations of courts of chancery. Injunctions may stop their proceedings; receivers may be appointed to take charge of their effects, and, if necessary, finally to dispose of and wind them up. All this is done under the sanction of the power that made them, and with the greatest tenderness and care for the preservation of that franchise which is the life of the corporation. The very power that sanctions the putting corporations into commission takes care to preserve life, and, when expiring, can resuscitate them. No doubt but the State Legislatures can make laws for corporations which they may denominate bankrupt laws, if they choose to do it; but those laws must apply to corporations alone, without connecting them with other subjects of an entirely different character. But it does not follow that Congress has that power over these State corporations. Such exercise of power would be a direct encroachment on State rights, and the States would not submit to it. They would not tamely surrender this exercise of prerogative to Congress, or transfer such an amount of business from the State to the Federal Judiciary.

Again, sir, who ever heard of including corporations with merchants and traders in a bankrupt law? It has been talked of, but never done; and if that proves any thing, it proves that talking about it is all that can be done with it. How fanciful the idea of connecting them with natural persons, because they are artificial persons! Why not include any thing else that may be artificially personified? The object of this delegation of power in the Constitution was to establish bankrupt laws for persons whose insolvency induced failure of payment—for natural persons exercising volition, free agency, and moral sense—not for artificial persons, without volition, on failure of payment. In short, for persons and not for things; not for the failure of institutions or of machinery, but by fictitious and fanciful analogies. I admit they may be extended to every thing in failing circumstances—to vegetation on the failure of crops; to the tree that may be fruitless from the blighting winds; but, after all, it would be forming little else than a fancy article.

But, sir, if a bankrupt system is to be formed for use, let it be formed with more regard to its appropriate objects and its practical uses. Its application to banks would not only be entirely unavailing for all the useful purposes contemplated, but it would prove itself a ruthless destroyer of those institutions. What would a banking corporation be when under this commission of bankruptcy, with all its effects in the hands of assignees? The receiver, or assignees, might walk into a bank, turn out the president and directors, the cashier, and all its other organized functionaries, but the new comers would not be able to carry on the business of the bank. From the moment of this change, the vital functions of this artificial person would be no more. Its franchise extinguished by the first touch of the invader, and without the State's power to resuscitate, it would be defunct, and that forever. Yes, sir, the very first act that would put the banks into the hands of the receiver or assignees, under this provision, would put an end to their existence. This would be cruel; it would verify the apprehensions of Roger Sherman, the delegate from Connecticut, who objected that, as bankruptcies were in some cases punished with death in England, he did not wish to grant a power by which that might be done here. Would not this be punishing with death, and would it not be severe, and more severe than the bankrupt laws of old? It would be cruel beyond example; even tragedy itself avoids exhibiting death in the first scene.

Mr. President, I listened yesterday with great pleasure to the learned and able argument of the honorable Senator from North Carolina, (Mr. STRANGE,) and in many of his remarks I readily concurred; but when, in the language of the faculty, he talked of this provision of including corporations as being wholesome medicine for the banks, it did, I assure you, give me some uneasiness, for it reminded me of that course of experimental alteratives which the banks, as well as the whole currency of the country, had of late undergone, and it carried to my mind a fearful suggestion that those patients were not yet out of the doctor's hands.

The honorable Senator made another suggestion, which was not so alarming. Indeed, it was amusing. It was fanciful, and well adapted to the fanciful theory of including corporations in a bankrupt law. The emphasis with which he distinguished that part of his speech was natural, as well as proper, and bespoke no more than that self complacency which we all feel on discovering what we deem important to ourselves or to our country. In speaking of this great bank corrective, he said they had discovered the great desideratum; he said it was the philosopher's stone; yes, sir, it was the philosopher's stone! Yet I could not but think that the Senator was under some mistake; and if this was that great desideratum, and the philosopher's stone, about which the alchymists had for centuries so stimulated the curiosity of the world, that it would hardly fulfil expectation. But if it was the real philosopher's stone, with all its wonder-working powers of transmutation, by which the alchymists contended that in the potency of its mysterious touch all the baser metals could be turned into pure gold, I could not but regret that it had not been discovered a little sooner, as it might have been a valuable auxiliary in carrying out and giving success to that experiment which has failed for the want of gold. But I believe, sir, this discovery is not the philosopher's stone. It seems to me more like another great desideratum which has commanded the deepest researches of the alchymist time out of mind, and that is, the universal solvent, which, by its mysterious workings, they contend, would dissolve all it touched, and to the corporations, especially the banks, this would be a universal solvent. Its touch would dissolve their goods and their franchises, and in all respects extinguish the last spark of their artificial vitality. The alchymists have always been borrowing trouble about what they should put this universal solvent into for safe keeping, inasmuch as it would dissolve every thing it touched, but here that difficulty ceases to embarrass. Put it into a bankrupt law, where it will destroy and dissolve what it touches except its own depository.

After all, sir, in relation to this philosopher's stone, even if we have it, I think we had better not retain it. If any adept in the wonder-working art of alchymy should, by the successful essays of his laboratory, be able to form this far-famed article, inasmuch as the pleasures of pursuit and anticipation so much exceed those of possession in those speculative matters, I would advise him to decompose the article, and scatter the ingredients broadcast, and thereby secure, by a new process, the higher delights of recomposing it.

The captured fox is sometimes restored to liberto—let loose and put upon his legs again, just to afford the huntsman the sport of another chase; and, if this is the philosopher's stone, I would, for reasons somewhat similar, say at once throw it away, sir, and, out of mere favor confer on the alchymists the pleasures of another hunt for it; and if it should take them a thousand years to find it again, that would be in season for all its purposes of usefulness.

I will soon conclude, Mr. President. I have expressed my objections to the bill offered by the minority of the committee, in amendment, and by way of substitute for the bill reported by the committee. I might add another objection found in that provision of the proposed substitute which allows to the several States the option of conforming or not, as might suit their pleasure, to the laws thus made for them; which would be mere mockery of legislation; but inasmuch as that provision seems not to have found any advocates as yet, I consider it now as out of the bill, by common consent, and I shall say nothing more on that point.

I have, therefore, only to repeat my approval of the bill reported by the committee, as one containing the correct principles of an American bankrupt law. Its details may, in some degree, be altered and thereby improved: its limitation for the period of two years ought to be dispensed with, since this is not contemplated as a mere temporary expedient, or as a special relief law for the present class of insolvent debtors. But it is intended as the commencement and foundation of a permanent bankrupt system for this country. No doubt but the commencement of such a system, at any time, would be attended by partial evil. Some inconvenience is likely to await every change. The law is in some degree retrospective in its operation on present contracts—this must be expected of a bankrupt law. But the power which authorizes it is expressed in the Constitution, and, like the laws of the land, is presumed to be known to all who have given credit. It may also disturb the present system of preferences, and have a tendency in some degree to limit credit. But trade and credit will soon restore and regulate themselves on the best practical basis, if your system of business is established on permanent and general rules and laws; and in relation to preferences, now allowed under the State insolvent system, they are always unequal and sometimes unjust, and will never be corrected without a uniform bankrupt law.

The principles of the bill are plain, and its provisions simple and practicable—fit for present use, and yet susceptible of future improvement, from time to time, as occasion may require. Uniformity and permanence are great and important requisites in the rules of human action. Men of business should be familiar with the great rules that govern conventional obligations in their formation and discharge, as well as those regulating exchanges in trade. How can this be done but by uniform and permanent provisions of law? It is not so important what systems or rules of business may be adopted, as that they should be uniform and permanent, so that all may know what to depend on by conforming their relations and operations to established systems and rules. If this bankrupt law is established, all future commercial intercourse will be carried on in relation to it. The business man in the North will know how this relation between debtor and creditor is in future to be treated in the South, and he may govern himself accordingly. It will promote that average, that equal distribution of property which creditors are entitled to upon the failure of the debtor. The principle of the obligation between debtor and creditor is, that the former shall pay in full, but this is on the ground that his property, his faculties, and his exertions will be adequate to that end, but on such entire failure of all those resources as render that end impossible, that obligation is to be discharged by an honest surrender of all his property, consisting of those resources in their nature divisible, for the benefit of creditors, and upon that to be discharged, as a fair equivalent, from the obligation. But, by the present insolvent laws of the different States, he is stripped of all his property in one of the States, and still within its limits he remains a prisoner. He has performed the obligation on his part, and yet the quid pro quo is withheld from him. While he participates in some of the immunities of freedom in one State, he is unable to step a foot out of it; while denied access to the other twenty-five States of the Union, those liberal words in the Constitution securing the reciprocal rights of citizenship through the United States are to him a dead letter.

SPEECH OF MR. KING, OF GEORGIA.

In the House of Representatives, March 18, 1840—On the "bill additional to the act on the subject of Treasury notes."

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWSON in the chair,) Mr. KING, who was entitled to the floor, rose and addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: The bill now under consideration proposes to renew the act passed the 12th day of October, 1837, authorizing the issue of Treasury notes, and the subsequent acts in addition thereto, excepting the limitations concerning the times within which such notes may be issued, and restricting the amount thereof so as to authorize the President of the United States to cause the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and keep in circulation Treasury notes to the amount of five millions of dollars. That there may be no mistake in regard to this important feature of the measure, I ask that the bill may be read.

[The bill was here read by the Clerk.]

It will be perceived (said Mr. KING) that, under the second section of the bill, "Treasury notes may be issued in lieu of others hereafter or heretofore redeemed, but not to exceed in the amount of notes outstanding at any one time the aggregate of five millions of dollars."

The limitations contained in the act of October, 1837, which was renewed by the subsequent acts of January, 1838, and March, 1839, prohibited the reissuing of Treasury notes in lieu of others received in Government dues or redeemed at the Treasury, and limited the amount to one issue of ten millions of dollars. These provisions of the act were doubtless inserted to take from it, as far as practicable, the odious character of a Government bank charter, to prevent the Treasury from becoming a bank of issue and circulation, and these Treasury notes from entering into the circulating medium of the country as currency. If the bill now before the committee shall become a law, as I doubt not it will, the salutary limitations in the act of 1837 will be repealed, and a Government bank of issue and circulation to the amount of five millions of dollars will, in fact, be established, of which the President of the United States will be the president and director, and the Secretary of the Treasury merely the cashier.

It appears (said Mr. K.) that these limitations have been found by the Secretary of the Treasury to be a most inconvenient check on his evident desire to issue paper money. In his report, bearing date December 24, 1839, speaking of the authority to issue Treasury notes, he says: "That authority expired in June last, and while in force contained requisitions immediately to receive those notes in payment when offered, and at the same time preventing the reissue of them, which proved to be exceedingly inconvenient." Several hints may be found in this report of the Secretary's strong desire to be authorized to issue this paper currency whenever he wants money. It is known to all that the Treasury notes which have been used as currency, and especially those bearing an interest of but one mill, have become a portion of the circulating medium of the country, and that they have in fact assumed the character of bills of credit. They have been purchased at the South for the purpose of being remitted to the North, and used throughout the country as currency and a medium of exchange. This is too notorious to admit of doubt or cavil, and I have no hesitation in giving it as my opinion that such was the object of the Administration in issuing them. But gentlemen say they are shortly to be redeemed—they are only required to meet a temporary deficency in the Treasury. This no new argument in favor of the policy; it has been used by the advocates of it for nearly three years, and yet the necessity exists, and if the Secretary of the Treasury is to be believed, is likely to continue. He says in the report I have referred to: "The Department is without resort, temporary or permanent, in case of material deficiences, and, considering all the circumstances before mentioned, with the dangerous liability in the law to have the whole of the outstanding Treasury notes paid in at any moment for public dues, without a power remaining to issue others in their stead." Does not every one know there will be a material deficiency in the revenue? And does not the Secretary acknowledge that he has no means, temporary or permanent, to meet the expenses of Government, and pay the Treasury notes now in circulation?

How can it then be contended that this is a temporary measure, and only intended to meet a present and pressing emergency? The Secretary complains piteously of the "dangerous liability in law to have the whole of the outstanding Treasury notes paid in at any moment for public dues." Very dangerous and inconvenient, doubtless, to be liable in law to pay these notes, to pay the debts of the Government, in any thing but by giving new notes for old ones. This, then, is the system which the Secretary's great financial skill has enabled him to recommend to Congress. It has been in operation new three years, and I hesitate not to say is to become the permanent policy of this Administration. The Secretary recommends no measure by which the Treasury may be supplied with means to pay these notes. They will be reissued on the credit of the Government, leaving a mere nominal rate of interest, not more, I venture to say, than one mill. They will go into circulation as currency. Not being issued on funds in the Treasury, they will be bills of credit, and the power to reissue them will make this measure a bank of issue and circulation. Who will attempt to deny it? Who can be so simple, so stupid, so wilfully blind, as not to perceive it? There can be no mistake, and, in fact, the reasons given by the Secretary amount to an admission that such is the design of the Administration. The great and intricate question of Government paper credits was most anxiously and critically considered in the Convention that framed the Constitution of the United States; and it is not necessary for me to say that the power to emit bills of credit cannot be found in that admirable instrument.

It may be proper, Mr Chairman, to refer to the Madison Papers, recently published, to ascertain precisely what the opinion and intention of the Convention was in regard to the power to issue bills of credit. I am aware, sir, that this question has been argued with unsurpassed ability by my honorable friend from South Carolina, [Mr. W. THOMPSON,] in his unanswered and unanswerable speech, delivered on this floor in May, 1838. Since that time, however, the publication of the debates in the Convention places beyond doubt what was the intention of that body in regard to the power to issue bills of credit. It appears that on the 6th of August the committee of detail reported the draught of the Constitution. The seventh article, which enumerates the powers of Congress, contained this clause: "To borrow money and emit bills on the credit of the United States." On the 16th of August, this article being under consideration—

"Mr. Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out the words 'and emit bills on the credit of the United States.' If the United States have credit, such bills would be unnecessary; if they had not, unjust and useless.

"Mr. Butler seconds the motion.

"Mr. Madison. Will it not be sufficient to prohibit the making them a tender? This will remove the temptation to emit them with unjust views. And promissory notes in that shape may, in some emergencies, be best.

"Mr. Gouverneur Morris. Striking out the words will leave room still for notes of a responsible minister, which will do all the good without the mischief. The moneyed interest will oppose the plan of government if paper emissions be not prohibited.

"Mr. Gorham was for striking out without inserting any prohibition. If the words stand, they may suggest and lead to the measure.

"Mr. Mason had doubts on the subject. Congress, he thought, would not have the power unless it were expressed. Though he had a mortal hatred to paper money, yet, as he could not foresee all emergencies, he was unwilling to tie the hands of the Legislature. He observed that the late war could not have been carried on had such a prohibition existed.

"Mr. Gorham. The power, as far as it will be necessary or safe, is involved in that of borrowing.

"Mr. Mercer was a friend to paper money, though in the present state and temper of America he should neither propose nor approve of such a measure. He was consequently opposed to a prohibition of it altogether. It will stamp suspicion on the Government to deny it a discretion on this point. It was impolitic, also, to excite the opposition of all those who were friends to paper money. The people of property would be sure to be on the side of the plan, and it was impolitic to purchase their further attachment with the loss of the opposite class of citizens.

"Mr. Ellsworth thought this a favorable moment to shut and bar the door against paper money. The mischiefs of the various experiments which had been made were now fresh in the public mind, and had excited the disgust of all the respectable part of America. By withholding the power from the new Government, more friends of influence would be gained to it than by almost any thing else. Paper money can in no case be necessary. Give the Government credit, and other resources will offer. The power may do harm, never good.

"Mr. Randolph, notwithstanding his antipathy to paper money, could not agree to strike out the words, as he could not foresee all the occasions that might arise.

"Mr. Wilson. It will have a most salutary influence on the credit of the United States to remove the possibility of paper money. This expedient can never succeed whilst its mischiefs are remembered, and as long as it can be resorted to, it will be a bar to other resources.

"Mr. Butler remarked that paper was a legal tender in no country in Europe. He was urgent for disarming the Government of such a power.

"Mr. Mason was still averse to tying the hands of the Legislature altogether. If there was no example in Europe, as just remarked, it might be observed, on the other side, that there was none in which the Government was restrained on this head.

"Mr. Read thought the words, if not struck out, would be as alarming as the mark of the beast in Revelations.

"Mr. Langdon had rather reject the whole plan, than retain the three words, 'and emit bills.'

"On the motion for striking out—New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia,* North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia—ayes 9; New Jersey, Maryland—noes 2.

"The clause for borrowing money was agreed to, nem. con."

Thus we perceive, sir, that the power was withheld by a vote of nine States to two. Who can say, after reading this debate, that it was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution to withhold the power from Congress to emit "bills of credit," to circulate as currency?

We have, in addition to the evidence of the journal of the Convention, the testimony of a distinguished member of that body, who voted against striking out. I allude to Luther Martin, one of the members from the State of Maryland, who says, in his address to the House of Delegates of that State, on the subject of the proposed new form of government:

"By our original articles of confederation, the Congress have power to borrow money, and emit bills of credit on the credit of the United States; agreeably to which was the report on this system as made by the committee of detail. When we came to this part of the report, a motion was made to strike out the words 'to emit bills of credit.' Against the motion we urged that it would be improper to deprive the Congress of that power; that it would be a novelty unprecedented to establish a Government which should not have such authority; that it was impossible to look forward into futurity so far as to decide that events might not happen that should render the exercise of such a power absolutely necessary; and that we doubted whether, if a war should take place, it would be possible for this country to defend itself, without having recourse to paper credit, in which case there would be a necessity of becoming a prey to our enemies, or violating the Constitution of our Government; and that, considering the administration of the Government would be principally in the hands of the wealthy, there could be little reason to fear an abuse of the power by an unnecessary or injurious exercise of it. But, sir, a majority of the Convention, being wise beyond every event, and being willing to risk any political evil rather than admit the idea of a paper emission, in any possible case, refused to trust this authority to a Government to which they were lavishing the most unlimited powers of taxation, and to the mercy of which they were willing blindly to trust the liberty and property of the citizens of every State in the Union; and they erased that clause from the system."

I now ask gentlemen, in all candor, where this Government finds authority in the Constitution, or by implication, to issue bills of credit under the name of Treasury notes, bearing a mere nominal interest, or, perhaps, no interest at all, and to issue them in the form, and for all the purposes, of bank notes as currency? Is the Constitution no barrier to the attainment of their object? Is the power of party-drill in this House so irresistible that, in obedience to its mandate, gentlemen will be found ready to trample on the Constitution of our country? Will they revive the miserable and condemned system of Government paper money? that system which was so loudly and universally complained of, and was one of the principal causes that led to the adoption of our present form of government.

That Government bills have been issued to a large amount as currency, we have the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury himself for asserting. The admission is to be found in his communication to the Committee of Ways and Means, by which it appears that Treasury notes to the amount of nearly two millions of dollars have been issued, bearing an interest of but one mill. Does any one suppose that this trifling interest ever has been or will be computed? Can it be pretended that it was stipulated on the face of the notes or any other purpose than to evade the law and violate the Constitution?

My own opinion is, that this bill will authorize the issue of Treasury notes without interest. Be that as it may, every one must admit that one mill interest is a most flimsy and degrading pretext to deceive the people and cheat the law. The Secretary says:

"Most of the first issue, yet unredeemed, are supposed to bear the lowest rate of interest, one mill, and most of the second issue not over two per cent. None of either of these issues, however, bear any interest on their face or otherwise after the expiration of one year from the time of their issue, and those bearing a large interest being usually held by capitalists will doubtless be paid in for duties and lands, or presented for redemption as soon as they fall due."

It appears from this statement that a large amount of notes issued in October, 1837, and bearing an interest of but one mill, which ceased at the expiration of one year from the time of their issue, are yet outstanding, and must have been in circulation nearly eighteen months without interest, and being in character and effect precisely similar to what was called Continental money, or bills of credit.

Mr. Chairman, I do not deny to this Government the authority to issue Treasury notes, bearing the legal or such rate of interest as will induce capitalists to receive them at par as security for a loan. This would make them nothing more nor less than one form of scrip for Government stock. What I contend for, sir, is, that we have no constitutional power to authorize the issuing of them in such form as will throw them into the currency of the country, and cause them to circulate as money. This, I assert, has been the effect of a large amount of the issues made by the Secretary of the Treasury, according to his own admission, under the several acts since October, 1837, and such, I believe, is the intention and will be the result of the issue which will be authorized by the passage of the bill now before the committee.

Sir, what are bills of credit? Various concurring authorities might be cited to show what is a bill of credit, but I shall only refer to one. The late Chief Justice of the United States defines bills of credit to be "paper issued by the sovereign authority, and intended to circulate as money." Let me ask gentlemen whether the issue of two millions of Treasury notes, bearing a nominal interest of one mill per annum, was not so intended? And is it not known that such was the result?

The policy which has been pursued by the Administration to lead to the issue of this Government paper money has been most insidious and deceptive. It was necessary, in the outset, to create the necessity. This was done by the most extravagant appropriations and wasteful expenditure of the public treasure, and commencing a war of extermination against the banks and credit system of the country, by which the revenue from all sources was greatly diminished and the expenditures of the Government vastly increased. This led, of course, to the bankruptcy of the Treasury, and the necessity of relief.

This necessity was as well known to exist when Mr. Van Buren entered on the discharge of his duties in March, 1837, as when he issued his proclamation to convene Congress the September following; and if he was ignorant of it, he is not fit for the high station he occupies. If he knew it, he was bound, by every consideration of duty and patriotism, to have convened Congress the very day after his inauguration, that timely and efficient measures might have been adopted to relieve the Treasury and preserve the Constitution and credit of the country. It did not suit his purposes to pursue a course so obviously necessary and expedient. He preferred that the machinery of Government should work its own destruction and the ruin of the country, and, consequently, Congress was not called until the Treasury was found to be without means to meet the demands against it. Congress was then called, as the same sudden disaster had created an unexpected emergency. The President, in his Message, bearing date 4th September, 1837, says: "Until the amount can be collected from the banks, Treasury notes may be temporarily issued, to be gradually redeemed as it is received." Similar language was used by the Secretary of the Treasury and the advocates of the measure in both Houses of Congress. It was urged as a temporary expedient to meet a pressing emergency. It was said then, as it has been in the passage of every bill since to authorize the issue of Treasury notes, that there was not time to make a loan in the ordinary way, and that it was absolutely necessary to issue these notes to meet the pressing demands against the Treasury. From October, 1837, until the last quarter of 1839, the Government has had an outstanding public debt, in the form of Treasury notes, to the amount of ten millions of dollars, has collected all but a very small amount from the banks, besides expending all the revenue; and yet we are informed that the necessity is so pressing that unless we authorize the issue of these Treasury notes, the country will be disgraced. No plan has been presented for our consideration to relieve the Treasury permanently, and I am persuaded it is not the intention of the Administration to present any, except that now before us for the issue of Government paper money.

Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. K.) what a commentary this course of policy is on the boastful professions of the Administration, and every political demagogue, from the President to the tide-waiter, that this is to be a hard money Government. I shall endeavor, sir, to show before I sit down, what sort of a hard-money Government it is the purpose of these in power to inflict on this country. For this purpose, I beg leave to refer the committee to the Message of Gen. Jackson, then President of the United States, dated December 7, 1830. Speaking of the re-charter of the Bank of the United States, he says:

"In the spirit of improvement and compromise which distinguishes our country and its institutions, it becomes us to inquire whether it be not possible to secure the advantages afforded by the present bank, through the agency of a Bank of the United States, so modified in its principles and structure as to obviate constitutional and other objections. It is thought practicable to organize such a bank, with the necessary officers, as a branch of the Treasury Department, based on the public and individual deposites, without power to make loans or purchase property, which shall remit the funds of the Government, and the expense of which may be paid, if thought advisable, by allowing its officers to sell bills of exchange to private individuals at a moderate premium."

Here, sir, is the plan of a Treasury bank; and I have no hesitation in saying that it can be traced in the acts and the policy of the former and present Administrations from that time to the present. It has been, and is, in my opinion, the deliberate, unwavering, never-sleeping purpose of this Jackson Van Buren dynasty to establish a bank on the revenues of the Government, and the acts authorizing the issue of Treasury notes are among the preliminary steps to the accomplishment of that design. The war against the credit system has been for no other purpose than to bring into disrepute and destroy our local institutions, distress and distract the people and drive out of circulation the currency to which we have been so long accustomed, to make way for this Government paper money. I could refer to almost every Executive message and Treasury report since 1830, in support of my argument; but, not being disposed to dwell on a subject which has attracted so much of public attention, and been discussed in almost every newspaper, and in every portion of our country, I will only call the attention of the committee to a paragraph or two of that very extraordinary and enigmatical document sent to us in December last by Mr. Van Buren as his message. On the subject of banks, he says:

"In a country so commercial as ours, banks, in some form, will, probably, always exist; but this serves only to render it the more incumbent upon us, notwithstanding the discouragements of the past, to strive in our respective stations to mitigate the evils they produce; to take from them, as rapidly as the obligations of public faith and a careful consideration of the immediate interests of the community will permit, the unjust character of monopolies; to check, so far as may be practicable, by prudent legislation, those temptations of interest and those opportunities for their dangerous indulgence which beset them on every side, and to confine them strictly to the performance of their paramount duty, that of aiding the operations of commerce, rather than consulting their own exclusive advantage. These and other salutary reforms may, it is believed, be accomplished without the violation of any of the great principles of the social compact, the observance of which is indispensable to its existence, or interfering in any way with the useful and profitable employment of real capital. Institutions so framed have existed and still exist elsewhere, giving the commercial intercourse all necessary facilities, without inflating or depreciating the currency, or stimulating speculation. Thus accomplishing their legitimate ends, they have gained the surest guarantee for their protection and encouragement in the good-will of the community."

Permit me, Mr. Chairman, to interpret these dark and mysterious sentences, and state what I understand them to mean in plain English. The President first proposes to take from the banks, by prudent legislation, their unjust character of monopolies, and confine them to the performance of their duty. It might be asked, if the character of monopolies is unjust, as applied to the banks, why take it away? He next proposes to confine their operations to the employment of real capital; which means that they shall not lend their credit in a form of a circulating medium. In other words, if they have gold and silver they may loan it out, or, if they prefer to deposite in the Treasury, they may receive Treasury notes or drafts, turn brokers, and sell them at such premium as the wants of the country will enable them to demand. He says: "That institutions so framed have existed and still exist elsewhere." He alludes, of course, to the banks of discount and deposite in continental Europe, where coin or bullion is paid on deposite, and a certificate issued to the depositor; and the President

*This vote in the affirmative by Virginia was occasioned by the acquiescence of Mr. Madison, who became satisfied that striking out the words would not disable the Government from the use of public notes, as far as they could be safe and proper, and would only cut off the pretext for a paper currency, and particularly for making the bills a tender, either for public or private debts.

gravely asserts that such banks will give "to commercial intercourse all necessary facilities, without inflating or depreciating the currency or stimulating speculation."

His intimation is too plain to be mistaken that they are not to issue bills as currency And this intimation, coming, as it does, from the great depositary of power in this Government, the President, deserves the most serious consideration of every reflecting man in the United States.

We have known, it is true, Mr. Chairman, that the Administration has been warring against the banks, but I do not suppose it has entered into the mind of any man who has not been a close observer of the progress of this Government, that it has been the intention, or is in the power of the President, to destroy our State corporations. We are all aware that no power is to be found in the Constitution to uproot and prostrate those institutions under which we have prospered beyond any people that ever before existed. No one could have supposed that all the powers of this Government combined could affect peacefully a revolution so tremendous and destructive. Yet, sir, so far has this revolution progressed, that not only our State institutions, but our whole country, lays prostrate at the feet of the Executive, and he is enabled to send to the Congress of the United States his plan for the regulation and management of the new order of things which he proposes to establish, and I venture to say, so far as his party here is concerned, that it has all the authority of an imperial ukase in the dominions of the Russian Autocrat. Sir, the power which the President has exercised, and will continue to exercise, to consummate the plan which is in progress, is peculiar to modern times—it is the power which controls the will, through the wants of the people—it is the money power. This power, which has been usurped by the Jackson-Van Buren dynasty, has already proved itself superior to the Constitution, and, in the true spirit of despotism, seeks to destroy whatever impedes its progress or endangers its success; and hence this war on our currency and banking system, or, in other words, the credit system.

To make this money power all-pervading and irresistible, it must exercise undisputed control over the currency. This was first attempted with the Bank of the United States, and then with the deposite banks. It was found that neither of those instruments could be relied on; conflicting interests and State legislation could not be brought to act in obedience to the will of the Federal Executive. It was therefore found necessary to destroy the State banks, and drive their currency from circulation, to prepare the way for this new, and, thus far, irresistible combination of the Executive with the money power of the country. This money power is found in the revenue. The President has usurped the control over it, and, to consummate his designs, it is proposed to authorize him to direct his Secretary of the Treasury to issue a paper currency in the form of Treasury notes and drafts, which must assume the character and office of circulating bank notes or bills of credit.

There has been no fact more fully and clearly established in the rise and progress of commerce, industry, and wealth, in the commercial nations of modern Europe and in this country, than that gold and silver, although affording the least destructible measure of value or industry, cannot be used, except to a very limited extent, as a general currency and medium for the circulation of commodities, with as much facility and advantage as bank notes and bills of exchange; and it will be found on examination, that the greater use a nation has made of these paper credits, as a measure of value or industry, instead of gold and silver, the more prosperous and commercial it has become, and hence the unparalleled progress of this country in all the great branches of national industry and wealth.

Gold and silver are the actual representatives as well as measure of value or industry, because they have always cost about the same amount of labor to produce them; they are more malleable and less destructible than other metals, and are therefore used as currency. Paper credits are also the measure of value, and, when actually based on the productive industry of the country where they are issued, are as much its representatives as gold and silver. These paper credits are to commerce what the vital fluid is to the human system, and we can only cease the use of them by ceasing to be an intelligent, commercial, and industrious people.

At a very early period the commercial nations of continental Europe perceived the necessity of using paper credits as a medium of exchange, and resorted to the only plan the despotic nature of their Governments would permit. That was banks of deposite, in which capitalists and merchants deposited the precious metals in the form of bullion or coin, and received certificates of deposite, which were circulated from city to city, and sometimes from one country to another. As commerce increased these certificates were found not to afford the necessary facilities, and bills of exchange were brought into use. In the progress of financial science, this country and Great Britain have adopted a credit system, founded on banks of discount, deposite, and circulation, which supply a currency based on the precious metals and the productive industry of the people. This system has sprung up under the fostering care and out of the very nature and spirit of our republican institutions, and the character of our people for integrity and enterprise.

It is not a little remarkable, Mr. Chairman, that while the more commercial nations of Europe are imitating our example as fast as the nature of their Governments will admit, and their people are slowly advancing to power under the gradual extension and beneficial influences of the credit system, we have been thrown back half a century by the power of the Executive.

The power to coin money is granted in the Constitution. This is simply the power to divide the precious metals into certain small portions, as prescribed by law, and stamp their value on them. This does not create their value. This was done by the labor that produced them from the earth. This power cannot be abused, or injuriously exercised, because nothing but gold and silver can be made a legal tender in the payment of debts. The power to make and emit paper money, or bills of credit, was, as we have seen, positively withheld from this Government. This power the Administration has usurped, and is now seeking to increase. It is well known that our present Chief Magistrate of the Jackson dynasty—I speak of him thus, sir, because he was appointed by his predecessor—controlled and governed the State of New York through the instrumentality of the Safety Fund banks. That system was framed for the purpose of controlling the money power of the State, and with it the political power. As I have already observed, no combination of the banks of the several States could be formed to act in concert with the President for the purpose of giving to him a similar control over the currency of the Union, and render it subservient to the political power. To do this, it was found necessary to issue the currency under the supreme direction and undivided control of the Federal Executive.

Sir, when the measures now in progress shall have been carried out, this tremendous, irresistible power will not only be conferred on the President, but he will be authorized to demand all the revenues of the Government in specie.

I hold in my hand the ominous concomicant measure to that now before the committee. I allude to the bill called, par excellence, the Independent Treasury bill. This bill provides that the first year, from and after the 50th day of June next, one-fourth of all the revenue of the Government, shall be paid in gold and silver; the second year, one half; the third year, three-fourths; and the fourth year, which will terminate the 30th day of June, 1844, all the revenues shall be paid in the precious metals. It is believed by very intelligent financiers that the specie now in the United States does not exceed fifty millions of dollars. The banks have in their vaults about thirty-two millions, and it is estimated there are about eighteen millions in circulation. If the revenue shall amount to an average of twenty millions per annum, or come up annually to the estimates for the current year, the Government will receive five millions of specie the first year, ten the second, fifteen the third, and have in the vaults of the Treasury on the 30th day of June, 1843, thirty millions of dollars. It appears from the provisions of this bill that the disbursing officers of Government will not be required to pay specie until the commencement of the fourth year; it is therefore to be understood that the specie collected the three first years will remain in the Treasury. This, as I have stated, will probably amount to about thirty millions of dollars. The Treasury note bill now under consideration authorizes, as has been stated, the President to direct his Secretary of the Treasury to issue, and keep in circulation, Treasury notes to the amount of five millions of dollars. If, therefore, he can redeem twenty millions in the course of the year, the estimated amount of the revenue, he can issue twenty-five millions, and leave five millions out at the close of the year. These five millions will cover the amount of specie it is supposed will be received the first year, and enable the President to retain it in his vaults. As the issue of these Treasury notes is, beyond all doubt, a part of this "Independent Treasury scheme," various pretexts will be used to increase the amount from time to time. An emergency, a pressing necessity, will be created, as an excuse for violating the Constitution, and giving the President the power to issue paper money. This "Independent Treasury bill" will, however, authorize the issue of Treasury drafts, which may be made, if necessary, to serve the same purpose as Treasury notes, and therefore the President will be independent of Congress and the people. He will have entire control over the revenue, can cause all the gold and silver received throughout the Union to be deposited in the city of New York, and, by issuing drafts payable only at that place, and sending them to all parts of the country, they will circulate as money, and be as seldom presented for payment as the notes of the United States Bank were when it was a national institution. And I have no hesitation in giving it as my well considered opinion that such is the design of the Administration, if any difficulty shall be thrown in the way of issuing an unlimited amount of Treasury notes. The most careless observer cannot fail to perceive that, with the power to issue a paper currency, and demand the revenue in gold and silver, the President can, in a very short time, close the doors of all our banking institutions. Such, sir, is the system which the Administration is exerting all its power to fasten on the country. Its desolating effects are seen and felt from one extreme of the Union to the other. Our currency has been reduced since the commencement of this scheme more than two thirds. The value of property and all the pursuits of industry has fallen in a geometrical proportion. In many sections of the country there is no currency at all; property cannot be disposed of at private sale, and when offered by the sheriff it goes for one-fifth, or perhaps one-tenth, of its real or productive value. If such is the effect of the commencement of these measures, who can imagine the distress and disaster that will attend their progress and consummation? These are the measures that have been pompously called, by the friends of the Administration throughout the country, "the great measures of relief and reform." They have been in actual operation since October, 1837, and have produced more distress and bankruptcy, individual and national, than has been witnessed in this country since the formation of the Government.

This, sir, is the relief and reform which may always be expected from the iron hand of despotism, when it is necessary to sacrifice the interests of the people to acquire power.

These measures will, and, in my opinion, are intended to establish precisely such a system of revenue, finance, and currency in this country as the Emperor Alexander established in Russia, and which has given to the Autocrat a power more efficient and terrible than his imperial armies.

That system is to receive the revenues of the Government in gold and silver, and pay its debts in paper money. The result has been that the Treasury has swallowed up all the gold and silver in the empire, and there is nothing in circulation, from one extreme of it to the other, but these Treasury notes, or Government paper currency. The Emperor can increase or diminish it at pleasure, and thus holds in his hand, not only the power to regulate the commerce and industry of the Empire, but the value of the property of every individual in it is subject to his will. The measures now in progress here will give to the President of the United States a power as absolute and despotic over the currency and interests of this country as that which is exercised by the Emperor Nicholas over all the Russias.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, that the President may, and I doubt not he will, make New York the great depository of all the gold and silver received for Government dues. It may be supposed, sir, that great benefits will thereby be conferred on that city. It must be borne in mind that New York exists on the commerce and industry of the whole Union, and that, if they perish, she must go down. Without them, she could be no more benefited by having all the gold and silver of the universe in her vaults, than the mountains of Potosi are by the rich ores they contain. New York owes much of her ascendency to the credit system, and will be the greatest sufferer from its destruction.

The Administration has shown a perfect disregard of all the interests of the country, and it is not to be supposed that any measure not strictly in accordance with its plans of self-aggrandizement will be adopted for the benefit of any particular city or section. New York will be selected as the place of this Treasury deposite, because it is the creditor city of the whole Union, and drafts or exchange on it are more valuable in all parts of the United States than on any other place; and, as three-fourths of the revenue from imports is received there, Treasury drafts will not be presented for payment, except when specie is wanted for exportation, because they will pass at par. In all other sections of the Union they will sell at a premium, and, as they are more easily transported than specie, all persons dealing in exchange will be anxious to obtain them. The consequence will be, that gold and silver will be sent from all quarters to be exchanged at par for Treasury drafts. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that New York must necessarily become the great recipient of the precious metals under this new order of things. Such has been the effect, thus far, and such must be the result of these measures. But, sir, what has already been the effect of them on the prosperity of that great commercial emporium? Is she not now sitting in sackcloth and ashes, and mourning the loss of her commerce? Does she not feel that the sources of her prosperity are drying up, and that the life blood no longer returns from the extremities to invigorate the pulsations of the heart of the commercial system?

Mr. Chairman, we are told that the South is to be benefited by this system; that the cotton growing States send abroad the great staple that commands gold and silver in the markets of Europe, and that when this measure shall be in successful operation, the precious mesals will flow into them from all quarters, and that, as they export seventy five millions annually, they will be able to pay the duties on their imports in specie, and have an abunpance of this blessed metallic currency. Sir, if because we export so largely we can demand gold and silver for our products, why have we not done it heretofore? Why has not the regular course of trade produced this result? Or, if it is so desirable, why cannot the shippers and owners of this produce demand specie for it, without these coercive measures of the Government? Has it come to this, that we of the South, who have been such sticklers for free trade, are about to kiss the hand of power and humbly pray to be driven, by force of law, into the line of our duty and interests? I am not surprised that bad men should aspire to power, when they find those who have been reputed wise can be gulled and led by such arguments.

We have a very recent example of the effect produced on the cotton trade by the withdrawal of a large amount of the precious metals from Great Britain, which I should suppose would teach the merest tyro in political economy that the cotton growing States of this Union are more interested than any other portion of the world in promoting the exchange of commodities among commercial nations, and that any cause which shall so far disturb the balance of trade as to produce a drain of specie and bullion from our great customer will materially affect the price of cotton. The short crops in England in 1837 and 1838 compelled her to throw open her ports to the grain of the continent. In a very short time the balance of trade was found to be against her, and in less than twelve months near twenty millions of dollars were drained from the vaults of the Bank of England to meet it. In 1838 the opium trade with China was stopped, and the London money market deprived of about ten millions of dollars which it had been accustomed to receive from that source. These events caused a deficiency in the English money market of about thirty millions of dollars, and came near compelling the Bank of England to suspend specie payment. To save itself from a step so prejudicial to its own interests and the fiscal operations of the Government, the bank resorted, as it will in all similar cases, to the most rigid restrictions on the cotton trade—accommodations were positively refused to all persons engaged in it, and the consequence was that prices were reduced in a very few months nearly one-half. The objects of the bank were to save itself from a suspension of cash payment by curtailing its liabilities, and to reduce the price of cotton; and consequently the price of yarns and other manufactured articles, which are consumed by the grain growing countries of the continent, so as to increase their consumption, raise the balance of trade in favor of Great Britain, and arrest the drain of the precious metals from her to the continent. If causes over which we could exercise no control have produced effects so prejudicial to the price of our great staple, could it be supposed by any well informed person that the people of the South can be duped into giving their support to measures which are intended to cause a much greater drain of bullion from England than she suffered in consequence of two short crops and the loss of the opium trade?

Mr. Chairman, I have shown that paper credits, in some form, must be used to facilitate the commercial and financial transactions of the age in which we live, and consequently it is perfectly absurd to suppose that this Government can or intends to make its disbursements in specie. Can any one believe for a moment that specie will be shipped from one extreme of the Union to the other, and carted hundreds of miles into the interior to pay contractors, laborers, soldiers, sailors, and all the employees of the Government, when Treasury drafts on New York would be worth more than specie to the receiver, and save the cost of transportation to the Government? Sir, the idea is absurd—the design of the Administration undoubtedly is to demand the revenue in specie, and make its disbursements in Treasury drafts or notes. We have been informed that the estimates for the expenditures of the Government have been made with great care, and as they embrace no contemplated appropriations for the prosecution of the Florida war, or other extraordinary expenditure, it is reasonable to presume that so long as the country shall suffer the rule of the present dynasty, the disbursements will not fall short of twenty millions of dollars per annum. The exports of the planting states are looked to to supply annually this enormous sum of the precious metals, which, in one year, would cause as great a drain from the English money market as the loss of two grain crops, and must necessarily drive the Government and the Bank of England to the adoption of measures similar to those which have, during the last year, affected us so injuriously; and if the Administration in this country shall be powerful enough to continue the system, it must, in the nature of things, result in the most disastrous consequences to the agricultural and commercial interests of the staple-growing states.

Mr. Chairman, let us now look to the effects which this "Independent Treasury" scheme will produce on the other great sections and interests of the Union. The planting States export the great staples that support our commerce with Europe, and supply our domestic manufactures; and they are the great consumers of the products of the industry of all the other States. Any measures, therefore, which affect injuriously the interests of the former, must necessarily be felt from one extreme to the other of the latter.

The almost exclusive application of labor in the staple States to the production of articles for exportation, prevents them from raising many articles for domestic consumption, and from engaging in manufactures. They consequently afford a most extensive market for the products and manufactures of the other States. Any cause, therefore, which shall injuriously affect the price of the exports of the former, will immediately deprive them of the power to purchase from the latter, and consequently their interests will suffer to an equal extent. Hence the price of cotton in Georgia influences the price of potatoes in Massachusetts, and the price of mules in Kentucky, and of wheat in Indiana. Sir, the price of our great Southern staple regulates the circulating value of Europe and this country. When it goes down, every interest at the North and West, as well as the South, feels the shock. The capitalist who lives on his rental, and rolls in his coach, finds his income reduced. The manufacturer and the mechanic no longer find a market for their wares and merchandise. The productive industry of the United States is divided into three great branches. At the South it is applied to the raising of exportable products; at the North and East, to commerce and manufactures; at the West, to the raising of stock and breadstuffs. The two latter are much more dependent on the former than it is upon them; because, if by any means the foreign market for the exports of the Southern States should be destroyed, the soil and climate which now produce cotton and tobacco would supply them with breadstuffs, and their surplus labor would be applied to manufactures. This state of things would injure and depress incalculably the commerce and manufactures of the North, and cut off the great market for the productions of the West. It will therefore be perceived that the fiscal action of the Government, under this Independent Treasury scheme, if it affects, as I believe it will, the South more injuriously than the other great sections of the Union, will nevertheless produce the most disastrous consequences troughout the country.

Mr. Chairman, there is one piece of twaddle in the President's message which I cannot pass in silence. It is in reference to the influence which the operations of the Bank of England have on our commerce, and out of which he frames a most statesmanlike argument, as he seems to suppose, against our banking or credit system, and in favor of his Independent Treasury. He labors to show that nothing but that measure can insure our safety against that foreign money power. As though desirous of proving his ignorance and his argument at the same time, he says: "It is thus that an introduction of a new bank into the most distant of our villages places the business of that village within the influence of the money power of England." Sir, if that remote village produced more breadstuffs, horses, mules, or manufactured goods than were wanted for home consumption, or desired any articles which it did not produce for comfort or luxury, the price of its exports and imports would be regulated by the demand and supply in the market where it had intercourse, and that demand and supply would be regulated by the general state of trade in the country; and if foreign commerce should be suffering in consequence of a short crop in England, our home market must necessarily feel the shock; and although "the business of that village" would unquestionably be more or less injured, it would not be because a bank had been "introduced." That circumstance could exercise no influence on the foreign supply and demand of its wants and commodities. The only influence the bank could exercise, in the prudent management of its business, would be to afford to the citizens the necessary facilities, or, in other words, the credit, in the form of bank notes, to enable them to convey their surplus produce to market. Sir, so long as England continues to consume our great staple productions, their price will depend on her ability to pay for and manufacture them. If her grain crops shall be destroyed by providential circumstances, and her resources required to supply her people with bread, we may be injured, but the destruction of our own credit system, and demanding the revenues of the Government in specie, will only aggravate the evil.

Mr. Chairman, you are aware of my uniform opposition to a Bank of the United States. I am of opinion that Congress does not possess the constitutional power to create a corporation, and I also believe that the two banks which have existed forty years since the adoption of the Federal Constitution have operated oppressively against the interests of the South. I was, and am, in favor of a separation of the fiscal action of the Government from the banks, because I thought it unjust to the South, which supplies the commerce that pays the revenue, that the banks of the North should be permitted to make use of that revenue as bank capital, and thereby be the better enabled to control our commerce. But, sir, I never gave in my adhesion to a Sub Treasury plan a priori, such as the Executive might choose to frame for the establishment of his own power, and the overthrow of our institutions. The question which has been presented to the people was simply a separation of the Government from the banks, and not the establishment of a Treasury bank on the revenues of the country. These measures, sir, which have been brought forward under a pretext of separating the Government from the banks, are, in my opinion, a most unblushing fraud upon the people, and are designed to establish that which the Administration has solemnly denounced—a Government bank—in the most odious and dangerous possible form. As much as I have been and am opposed to a Bank of the United States, I consider the measure proposed as a thousand-fold more dangerous and objectionable.

So long as the revenue does not exceed the disbursements of the Government, a connection with the banks cannot be attended with much danger to the former, or benefit to the latter, or operate very unequally on the various interests and sections of the country. It is only when a large surplus accumulates in the Treasury that these evils are to be apprehended. If, therefore, the Administration is sincere in its professions to the South, that no more is to be collected than an economical expenditure will require, the danger of a connection with the banks has been greatly magnified.

If, as the friends of the Administration affirm, the operations of the Sub-Treasury will not abstract more than five millions of dollars from circulation, how can it be supposed that the President, with this comparatively small sum under his control, will have the power to establish a metallic currency throughout the country, change the character and regulate the business of our banks, and drive their notes from circulation? Yet, all this he proposes to accomplish; and when the real design and tendency of his measures are shown, his friends in this House and out of it affirm that a very small amount of specie will be required to accomplish this tremendous revolution in the monetary system and political institutions of the country. Mr. Chairman, the declarations of the dynasty which now reigns over this country are characterized by all the duplicity that has ever marked the course and policy of usurpers. Sir, I have given my views of the design and tendency of the measures now in progress, and I believe as firmly as I do in an overruling Providence, that unless the people of this country shall rise in all the majesty of freemen, and eject from power our oppressors, they will fasten upon us a despotism infinitely more intolerable than that from which the war of the Revolution delivered our fathers.

It is not my purpose to withhold from the Administration the necessary means to meet the wants of the Government; I object to the issue of Treasury notes in the form proposed in the bill under consideration, for all the reasons I have had the honor to present to the committee; and as I am perfectly certain that Government stock, bearing an interest of four and a half per cent. will immediately command the sum asked for, and will, in fact, no more create a public debt than the issue of Treasury notes, I have prepared a substitute for the bill on the table, which I beg leave to submit to the consideration of the committee.

REMARKS OF MR. EVANS,

OF MAINE,

In the House of Representatives, March 24, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, upon the bill authorizing a further issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. EVANS said he had been desirous, several days, to submit a few observations to the committee upon the bill now under consideration; and he regretted that he had not been able to obtain the opportunity of doing so when the subject was somewhat fresher than it is now, and before so many topics, more or less connected with it, had been drawn within the range of the debate. The measure was introduced, and was discussed, by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. JONES] purely as a measure of finance, growing out of the present and urgent necessities of the Treasury. Since that period, the circle of debate had been constantly enlarging; but, without regarding other matters which had thus been brought within it, Mr. E. said he should confine the remarks he intended to offer to the measure as proposed and as discussed by the honorable chairman—a financial measure merely. I think it much to be regretted (said Mr. E) that this subject of the finances of the country—the condition of the Treasury, present and prospective—appears to possess so little interest, and to attract so small a share of the attention of the House. Upon this branch of the Legislature, particularly, the framers of the Constitution intended to bestow the guardianship and the watchful care of the public treasure; and doubtless they supposed that motives would never be wanting for a vigilant execution of this trust. The taxing power, the raising of revenue, which may impose burdens upon the people, and the expenditure of it, were intended to be subjected to the severest scrutiny by their immediate representatives; and yet, sir, we see how difficult it is to detain a quorum of members in their seats when a bill founded upon the pressing necessities of the Government, and the best means of supplying those necessities, is under consideration. The situation which I hold, as a member of the committee from which this measure emanated, has made it my duty to look somewhat more closely into the condition of the Treasury, and the prospects before it, than probably I otherwise should have done; and I confess, sir, I am very far from being satisfied with either the one or the other. The present condition is, confessedly, embarrassed and straitened; and the prospect, in my judgment, by no means gratifying. In regard, therefore, to the present measure, I desire to say in advance that, if I vote for it at all, it will be with very great reluctance, and solely from a conviction that its speedy passage is required in order to enable the Government to meet its obligations and to preserve its faith.

I agree with the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means that the measure contemplated by the bill, or some substitute for it, equally prompt and efficient, is most imperiously demanded by the present state of the Treasury. But I differ from that gentleman entirely as to the necessity being a mere temporary pressure, or that there is any prospect that the Treasury notes authorized by the bill are to be redeemed within the year. The bill itself, on the face of it, is fallacious in that clause which gives power to the Secretary to redeem the notes at any time within the year upon giving sixty days' notice of such as he may desire to call in. The design of this provision is to convey the idea that the Treasury will be able to redeem these notes, or a portion of them, in a short period from the accruing revenue of the year. The honorable chairman rests his defence and support of the bill upon that ground distinctly. He argues that the whole receipts of the year will be equal to all the expenditures of the year, and that the bill is nothing more than an anticipation in the former part of the year of revenue to be received in the latter part of it. The President in his message of 17th February, and the Secretary of the Treasury in his communication of the 15th, place it upon the same ground; both regarding it, as does the honorable chairman also, merely a temporary measure to guard the Treasury against "the fluctuations" to which its receipts and expenditures are at present exposed. In their opinion, all the troubles and embarrassments of the finances are attributable to "fluctuations." It has been said by the Secretary several times, and repeated by the honorable chairman, and re-repeated in still stronger language by the honorable member from New York, that the present exigency grows out of the fact that the disbursements are much the largest in the early part of the year, while the receipts are much the largest in the latter part of the year. Now, sir, in my judgment, this view of our financial condition is entirely fallacious; and it seems to me that one of the most imperious duties which now devolve upon the House is to look this subject full in the face, to understand the matter as it really is, and to provide suitable remedies for the difficulties under which the Treasury is laboring. From the best view I am able to take of the state of the finances, I am persuaded that the embarrassments of the Department are not attributable to the causes supposed; but to a deficiency in the revenue to meet the expenditures, a deficiency which, during the year and for some time to come, will be constantly increasing, unless some effectual remedy be applied. The real difficulty is, that our income does not meet our expenses, and has not for about three years past. As to the idea that the largest part of the disbursements, "much the largest portion," said the chairman, occur in the early part of the year, and "much the larger portion of receipts" in the latter part, I can discover no foundation upon which it rests. There is nothing in the experience of past years to justify it. Indeed, the very reverse appears to have been the case. I have looked back only three or four years, and I find that, in 1836, the receipts for the first three quarters of the year were - - - - $38,141,898
Being an average of, per quarter - 12,713,960
While the receipts of the last quarter were only - - - 10,732,066
Falling short of an average about two millions.

In the same year, the expenditures in the three first quarters were - - - $20,791,372
Being an average per quarter of - 6,930,457
While the expenditures of the last quarter were - - - 9,864,872
Exceeding the average of the three quarters by about three millions.

In 1837, the average receipts of the three first quarters were, in round numbers - $5,000,000
And of the last quarter - - 4,500,000
Falling off only half a million, which was undoubtedly owing to the great embarrassments in the latter part of that year, occasioned by the suspension of specie payments. Indeed, the only wonder is, that the revenue of the last quarter of 1837 did not fall off more than it did.

The average of expenditures for the three first quarters of the same year was - $8 472,972
And of the last quarter - - 6,396 493

Showing a considerable falling off. But this is not a matter of surprise, when we recollect that such was the embarrassment of the Treasury that year that an extra session of Congress was convened to replenish it; and doubtless the Departments curtailed, in every possible mode, for want of funds. The year 1837, from these causes, is scarcely a fair standard for ordinary years.

In 1838, the average of receipts for the first three quarters was - - - - $6.119,601
And of the last quarter was - - 6,793,753
Showing a small excess in the latter part.

While the average of disbursements was, for the first three quarters - - - $8,029,259
And of the last quarter - - 7,458 836

In both the receipts and disbursements of this year, the last quarter was very near an average of the others, not varying enough from it to justify the idea of the great fluctuations upon which so much stress is laid.

We have yet no exact account of the last quarter of 1839; but the Secretary, in his estimates, sets down the probable receipts and expenditures very little varying from the ascertained average of the first three quarters. Such, sir, is the experience of the Department upon this subject, and I think it very satisfactorily shows that ordinarily both the income and the expenditure of the latter part of the year bear a very near approach to the average of the earlier part. As regards the present year, I am aware that a redemption of about two millions of Treasury notes will fall upon the Treasury in March, April, and May, but that amount does not bear a proportion to the whole expenditures of the year sufficiently large to authorize the assertion that "much the larger portion" of disbursements fall upon the early part of the year; nor to require an issue of five millions of new Treasury notes to meet them.

This measure must stand, sir, if it stands at all, on other, and, as I think, stronger grounds. It grows out of an immediate pressure on the Treasury; a pressure not caused by a mere fluctuation in receipts and expenditures, but from an absolute deficiency of means. It is not an anticipation of the revenue merely, but the creation of a debt—a borrowing of money which the resources of the country, and the revenue hereafter to be received must day. I am aware that payments are expected in the last part of the year of certain balances due from the late deposite banks, and from the last bond of the United States Bank; but these are not the ordinary resources of the Government, and fall considerably short of the amount now proposed to be issued. So far as these resources are relied upon to meet the redemption of this debt, the Treasury is living on its capital, and not on its income. In my judgment, therefore, unless some other and more satisfactory reason shall be assigned for expecting a large revenue in the latter part of the year, much larger than ever the Secretary anticipates, it will turn out that at the close of the year these notes will be unredeemed, and an increasing deficiency in the means of the Government to meet its disbursements will exist.

Upon what foundation does the expectation rest of being able to redeem this emission within the year? Is it experience? Is it probability? Is the revenue of the country increasing or diminishing? Will it equal this year an average of the last three years? In the first place, a biennial reduction of duties has taken place amounting to $800,000: and again, does the present condition of the country justify the expectation of extensive importations? That I will consider hereafter. Has the ordinary revenue of the last three years been equal to the expenditures?

I will now show how that matter stands. On the 1st day of January, 1837, there was supposed to be in the Treasury five millions of dollars, directed to be retained when the surplus money was deposited with the States, but, in point of fact, owing to subsequent payments not known to the Secretary when the distribution commenced, these five millions turned out to be $6,670,000. Then we kept back the fourth instalment due to the States, which was $9,367,000. Since then we have collected three bonds from the United States Bank, which amounted to not far from six millions. There is now outstanding two millions of Treasury notes; and added to all these, of postponed merchants' bonds for revenue accruing in 1835, and which would have been collected and distributed prior to 1837, there has been since paid about seven millions. The precise amount I am unable to state. These various sums amount, in all, to over thirty millions of dollars. From this amount, there is to be deducted the sum due from the banks, $800,000, and the amount in the Treasury, about $1,500,000. Deduct two millions more for contingencies and possible failures in the collection of the bonds, and you have over twenty-five millions which has been expended within three years, over and above all the ordinary revenues of Government. In other words, the expenditures of the Government have exceeded its income, in three years, upon an average, more than eight millions a year.

What reason have we to expect that things will be any better during the present year? I confess I see no ground of such expectation, even should the present amount of business continue. I am aware the Secretary holds a different opinion. He tells us that the expenditures are estimated at so much, and the receipts at so much, and, by hard paring down on the one hand, and swelling up on the other, he brings the amounts near to each other; but there is too much reason to fear he errs on both sides. This was his opinion at the beginning of the session; an opinion which the honorable chairman says remains unchanged except so far as the Treasury shall be drawn upon for refunding duties by reason of recent decisions of the courts, and except so far as the expected revenues shall be cut off by the embarrassments of the country. A very large exception, indeed! As to the amount called for in consequence of the decisions of the courts, it does not yet amount, so far as I am able to learn, to one hundred thousand dollars, and we have a bill now pending to put a stop to that. The Secretary still holds the opinion unchanged, that the accruing revenue of the year will come up to his original estimate, unless there be some cause to diminish it; unless, indeed, it shall be cut short by the embarrassments of the country!

Well, sir, that is a very sufficient cause for a failure. He has estimated the accruing revenue at three millions for the last three months, but has any thing like that amount been received? I speak not of payments of bonds on last year's importations, but of duties accruing on the importations of these months. I fear, sir, the Secretary is doomed to a woful disappointment. The importations of the present spring, as compared with the corresponding period of last year, have fallen off three-fourths, according to all the information we have upon these subjects. Our vessels are returning from Europe almost empty. I am well informed, and the Secretary knows the same, that one of our best packets has recently arrived in New York, and instead of a freight of twelve hundred pounds sterling, which she had last year, it now falls short of four hundred pounds. The Secretary may "hold his opinion" as long as he pleases, but experience is doing away with the grounds of it every hour. The packets, instead of bringing heavy importations, the duties on which would recruit the Treasury, are, in fact, carrying away goods, with a view to receive the drawback; and this arises out of the embarrassments of the country, because the merchants cannot, dare not, sell them in this country. There is no demand for them. The people are no longer able to purchase or to pay.

How it may be with the receipts from the public lands, I do not know; but it can hardly be otherwise than that they must be much affected by the present condition of the country. And what is that condition? What is the occasion of this diminution in our receipts? The Secretary admits that there is great embarrassment prevailing throughout the country, occasioned by the suspension of specie payments by some of the banks. This is the more valuable and important admission, as I believe it is the first time an intimation has ever come from that quarter that the revenue of the country, or the state of the Treasury, was at all dependent upon the banks. I am glad that at last it is discovered that the state of the Treasury has some connection with the state of the banks, upon which so long and so indiscriminate a war has been waged. It is found out at length, too late to repair the evil, that we have been all along crippling our own resources, while we thought we were only crippling the banks. The honorable chairman seemed to think that the whole embarrassment under which the country now suffers is occasioned by the banks turning, as he said, the last screw upon the commercial community. But is this so? All the information we have leads to a conclusion directly the reverse. The banks are quite easy. Money is plenty enough. Yet there is little demand for it. The real difficulty is, that there is no business to do. What do we hear from New York? So far from there being any pressure there, every mail informs us that money is abundant. The banks can loan much more than there is any demand for. Do not gentlemen see that large loans are now daily making by capitalists on mortgages? The demand for business purposes is small. Credit is almost destroyed, and, with it, business ceases. And this is just what we might expect. Why should our merchants make large importations? Where can they sell their goods? Not in the West, nor in the South. Why? Because the Southern and Western merchants cannot afford to pay for them in a currency worth from ten to twenty per cent. more than the currency for which they must sell them. Hence business has ceased; it has come to a stop. There is hardly any channel of communication between the importers and the purchasers. Whence, then, is the revenue to be derive? Are not the prices of every thing declining? Are not wages falling? Are not our manufactures stopping? All these go to make up the business of the country; and when these stop, business stops, and the revenue stops. Gentlemen seem to delude themselves with an idea that the business of the country is of course to revive. What is there to occasion its revival? What cause is operating? It is, indeed, true, that a healthy action is going on. We are now largely exporting both cotton and flour; but these go chiefly to pay for former importations. We are diminishing, slowly to be sure, our commercial debts abroad, but this brings no revenue. There is another reason why our accruing income for this year will be short, to which the Secretary himself refers, but does not, as I think, attach sufficient importance to; and that is, that the country is already stocked with goods of former years' importation, and hence fewer may be expected this year.

In view of this state of our affairs, what is there to revive the commerce of the country? What fresh demand for imported goods is likely to arise? We all know that American credit of every kind has been lately a good deal impaired abroad. Is it likely that, in such a state of things, foreign manufacturers and merchants, who have hitherto largely supplied our cities on their own account, will continue to do so. A large amount of State stocks has been taken up here, and remitted abroad, much of which has gone to pay for imported fabrics. Probably no more will be sent for a considerable period at least; and I confess, sir, I can discern nothing in our present condition, or in prospect, which leads me to the belief that any revival of the business of the country is likely soon to occur which will have a favorable influence on our finances.

The Secretary himself tells us that, after the next year, a permanent deficiency in the revenue may be anticipated, owing to the great reduction then to be made in our tariff of duties. So that not only the money which we now borrow by Treasury notes is not to be a mere draft in anticipation of an accumulating revenue, but is evidence of a deficiency, which deficiency will be increased from year to year. Yet the House is told by the honorable chairman that this operation is but a mere anticipation of accruing revenue. Such a view of it is certainly fallacious, and will delude the House, and deceive the country. Better, far better, to open our eyes to our real condition, and to meet the crisis as we ought. I could have wished that the Secretary had taken a different view, and had made a full expose of the true condition of our finances, instead of this labored effort to cover up and hide the nakedness of the Treasury from the public eye. The truth is, we are now in debt, and it is proposed that we shall increase it still more to keep the Treasury along, while at the same time there is no prospect of any early improvement of our finances. We are living on borrowed money, having exhausted our capital, and we are about to borrow more for our daily expenses. But not only has there been great error in overstating our probable receipts—there is also as great in underrating our expenditures. The Secretary, I know, has made constant effort to keep down the estimates; and they are certainly a good deal curtailed. But it seems to me he must be sensible that those estimates must of necessity be considerably exceeded.

I am aware of the strong solicitude which has prevailed with the President, and the Secretary also, to exhibit the lowest amount possible, necessary for the service of this year. The motives for this are quite apparent, but I shall not speak of them. We are now building two steam frigates, for which about $350,000 are wanted this year. But this does not appear in the estimates; and how is it proposed to supply it? Why, by borrowing from the standing appropriation for the gradual improvement of the navy that amount, which is to be reimbursed next year, and which will of course go into the estimates of next year. Why did not the Secretary estimate for it this year, and receive it in the usual mode? It makes no difference in the Treasury. The money is to be taken out in either mode; but the mode adopted, of borrowing the amount from another fund, tends to keep down the estimates, and to give the Government credit for economy. This is but one instance of the manner by which the estimates are kept down, and, as I think it will turn out, kept down below what will be actually required.

The complaint, or the assertion, which ever it may be considered, that the estimates are not always to be relied upon, is not new. In 1838 the Committee of Ways and Means made a report upon the condition of the finances, in which they state—

"The annual estimates submitted by the Secretary the Treasury in December last, embraced no estimate of the amount which would be required for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities." "The estimates of the War Department, already submitted to the House for these purposes, amount to 5,265,000 dollars."

The report also speaks of an extraordinary appropriation of $625,000 for the protection of the Canadian frontier. So that in that year nearly six millions of dollars, for two objects alone, were appropriated, not appearing in the estimates. The then chairman of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG] who appeared to possess, in this instance, more sagacity than he always obtained credit for, foresaw, as I think, that the measure then in contemplation, which was an issue of Treasury notes, in anticipation of the revenues of that year, would not get rid of the difficulty. He did not believe that they could be redeemed within the year, and accordingly recommended that one-third only should be payable in one year, one-third in eighteen months, and one-third in two years. Instead of that, however, they were all made redeemable in one year, and the result was, that, at the expiration of it, a new law was passed authorizing a new emission; and now, at the end of another year, when these become payable, we are called on to pass another law for another issue. Now, sir, if the estimates of former years have so signally failed, why are we required to place such implicit confidence in them now? Indeed, if I recollect aright, several additional estimates have come in since the annual report of the Secretary, to what extent I am not able to say.

[Mr. JONES here said that there were some few which had arisen from accidental causes which were not known when the estimates were made up.]

Mr. EVANS resumed. I do not mean to be understood that they were then known and designedly withheld, but I have said, and now repeat, that the Treasury estimates communicated at the beginning of the session are not to be relied on; and this may arise from various causes. There are, of necessity, many appropriations which must and will be made in Congress for objects which the Government cannot estimate beforehand. Such has always been the case, and such of necessity must continue to be. I do not advert particularly to those which have been already introduced into the House this session and have failed. There are one or two which I feel myself a great interest in, and which I shall press before the close of the session with what ability I possess, and I hope successfully. One of them is a long-delayed debt due in part to the State from which I come. And I here give notice to the honorable gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. McKAY,) that I do not intend that subject shall be delayed to the last hour of the last day, as it has been on a former occasion. He must prepare to meet it somewhat earlier now. Then, there is another claim, perfectly well founded, which will amount to some one or two thousand, due wholly to the State of Maine, which I trust also to have allowed. Both of these will exceed half a million.

[At this point Mr. UNDERWOOD of Kentucky, Mr. EVANS having given way for that purpose, moved that the committee rise.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to amend that motion by adding the words "and report the bill," but the amendment was pronounced out of order.

Tellers were demanded; and the House having divided, the ayes were 60, the noes 90. So the committee refused to rise.]

Mr. EVANS resumed. Before proceeding further I will here state what would have been more appropriate in a former part of my remarks, that I have just been informed by a gentleman who has full knowledge of the fact, that the duties on the cargoes of four ships which have arrived at New York within a few days past, compared with the duties paid by the same vessels last year, amount to about one-seventh part only of what they were then. These are facts not to be mistaken. And how the Secretary of the Treasury and the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means can say that their opinion as to the receipts of this year remains unchanged, is quite incomprehensible to me.

I have a few words only to say in reply to the suggestions of the honorable Chairman, and repeated also by the gentleman from New York over the way, (Mr. VANDERPOEL,) about the delay in bringing in this bill. They both say that the Secretary did early give notice of an expected deficit in the Treasury, and so early that the House had ample time to consider the subject, and to adopt any different mode of meeting and providing for it which they might deem advisable. In support of this position, several extracts have been read from the Secretary's annual report. Do the gentlemen mean to be understood that the bill now under consideration is founded upon the recommendations which they have cited? Do we not know, and have they not so advocated it, that the measure is called for by the immediate exigencies of the Treasury? Does not the honorable Chairman remember that he called it up, and pressed it the other day expressly upon the ground that the notes were now wanted to meet the outstanding debts of the Government? Since then, what opportunity has this House had to adopt any other mode of providing for those debts? When a direct loan is proposed by those who doubt the constitutional power to issue Treasury notes, gentlemen turn round and tell us that there is not time to effect it; that the faith of the Government will be violated, and its credit impaired, before you can realize any thing from that source. What is this but putting us off till there is no time to adopt any other remedy? This bill is for $5,000,000; but I venture to predict that before the close of the session, the Treasury will require five millions more. And although this cannot but be foreseen, we have no admonition of it; and when at last the application shall be made, we shall be told, as we are now told, that the exigency is very great, and there is not time enough to make a loan, or to adopt any other measure of supplying the Treasury. I predict this, sir, and time will disclose how far my expectations are well founded.

The present measure, if I have any knowledge of it at all, grows out of the message of the President, of 17th February, communicating the Secretary's letter to him of the 15th February, showing the immediate demands upon his Department, and is not in any degree founded upon the general recommendations in the annual report, which have been relied upon. These recommendations look altogether to some "permanent safeguard." No intimation is given of early, immediate, pressing demands; but the argument is general, applying to all time, in favor of some "constant safeguard," some "permanent remedy," some standing, abiding, continuing law, authorizing him to issue Treasury notes, or make loans, or adopt other measures, whenever, in his judgment, the necessities of the Treasury require it; an authority not limited to one year as this bill is, but operating at all times, standing, permanent, continuing. This is no new idea of the Secretary. He has renewed it, and urged it over and over again, for the last six years; and yet the authority he desires has never been granted. How, then, were we to consider it as a special recommendation of this particular bill? What admonition did these general suggestions and arguments furnish us of this especial measure? No, sir, this bill is founded upon a particular recommendation, to meet a special emergency, and does not, in any degree, come up to the very extraordinary power desired by the Secretary. I say extraordinary, sir, because I think his recommendation, so often urged and so perseveringly repeated, is a most extraordinary one; one which has never found favor enough in Congress to be seriously considered. He desires no less than authority to contract debts, to borrow money, whenever, in his judgment, the interests of the Treasury require it. The Constitution tells us that Congress shall have the power "to borrow money on the credit of the United States;" but the Secretary thinks that that power had better be lodged with him. Give him authority to borrow money or to issue Treasury notes, which is defended and justified on the constitutional authority "to borrow money," and he will take care, he says, to guard against all unexpected deficiencies. Now, sir, this looks to me exceedingly like surrendering the whole power of Congress, on this subject, into the hands of the Secretary; and having thus given to the Executive full power to replenish the Treasury, we have only to give him like authority to disburse it, and the Government will be reduced to what was not long ago recommended, quite a simple machine. The Representatives of the people will then be spared a great deal of the labor now devolved upon them.

I have been not a little perplexed, and a little amused too, by some of the arguments of the Secretary in favor of this "permanent safeguard," which he seems to think has always hitherto existed. He says:

"Much has at times been wisely done by Congress to supply means for meeting unexpected deficiencies. But all legal provisions heretofore adopted for that purpose having expired, our financial operations will be constantly exposed to danger, unless some permanent safeguard under contingencies is established."

I should be gratified, sir, if the honorable chairman, who is the organ of the Secretary on this occasion, would inform the House what "legal provisions heretofore adopted" "to supply means for meeting unexpected deficiencies" have expired. What authority which the law has ever conferred upon the Secretary does not now belong to him? His own answer is this:

"In our system, the provision on this subject was very uniform and permanent, till the extinguishment of the national debt in 1835. Previous to that time, a large balance beyond the expenses for ordinary purposes was generally collected, and being kept on hand till near the close of the year, so as to assist in any contingency, was then, if not thus wanted, applied towards the payment of the debt."

That is, while we are burdened with a public debt, to the extinguishment of which several millions a year were devoted, we had existing legal provisions to meet any unexpected deficiency. What were they? Why, nothing more and nothing less than that any balances which might happen to be in the Treasury, not used during the year in payment of the public debt, nor for other purposes, were at his command. Are they not so now? We are at this time wholly free from public debt, except the small amount of outstanding Treasury notes, and the Secretary has, therefore, the whole receipts of the year, and all the power and "every legal provision" which was ever in force, to meet unexpected fluctuations. He is, in truth, much better provided, so far as legal provisions are concerned, than while we had a public debt, inasmuch as no part of the annual income is required to pay either principal or interest of such a debt. The true difficulty in the case is, that, whereas while we were involved in a heavy debt, our resources were equal to our expenditures, and to the payment of several millions annually besides; now, when we are relieved from debt, our income falls short of our expenses. The Treasury was always exposed to "fluctuations" and "unexpected deficiencies"—as much so as it is now; and no other authority ever existed as a "permanent safeguard" than now exists. No "legal provisions" have expired. All the receipts and all the balances are now, as they always have been, liable to be used "so as to assist in any contingency;" and if it has at length come to this, that the expenditures exceed the revenue, it is not to be set down as a fluctuation or a contingency, but should be acknowledged as a deficiency, and be met as a deficiency.

After the payment of the public debt, the Secretary says: "The first resort, in the event of fluctuations, was temporary, and consisted of the accidental and unexpected accumulations which immediately followed." How these accumulations were either accidental or unexpected, I confess I do not comprehend, except that the amount somewhat exceeded what might have been anticipated. Being relieved from the payment of some twelve or fifteen millions annually, it was quite natural to suppose that a considerable surplus would accumulate; and when this surplus was expended and divided among the States, without the power to recall, the Secretary finds himself, as he says, "without any resort, temporary or permanent, in case of material deficiencies." That he has no power to borrow money, or to lay taxes, or impose duties, or issue Treasury notes, or to do that which Congress alone can do—to supply the ways and means of carrying on the Government, I freely admit; and I further admit that no such authority has at any time before existed in the Department, or ought to exist at any time hereafter. The Secretary stands precisely where all his predecessors have stood before him. Whenever the exigencies of the Treasury have required, Congress has provided the mode of meeting them; but no standing, permanent authority, that I know of, has ever been given to the head of the Department, in his discretion, to meet contingencies, and fluctuations, and deficiencies in the mode now recommended. Indeed, all this parade about fluctuations and contingencies is illusory.

The secret is just here—our receipts do not meet our disbursements, and that is the whole matter. It is due to the country that they should know at once that the revenue is fast declining, and that some measures must be resorted to without delay to meet the deficiency. One of the reasons which the Secretary assigns for these alleged fluctuations is worthy a moment's notice:

"The practice of incurring expenses in certain cases, sometimes legislative and sometimes military, or of a different character, in anticipation of appropriations, and occasioned by unexpected necessities or unusual delays, seems to be increasing. It augments the risk of a temporary deficiency, because large sums thus become payable in a mass and forthwith from the Treasury, when most of the members of Congress, at the time of making the appropriations, except that the burden will be spread somewhat equally over the whole of the ensuing year."

If this practice has prevailed, and is increasing, why is it not arrested? Is it not wholly unauthorized? Is it not an abuse, and one of a dangerous character, too? But, really, how does a delay to make an appropriation throw an additional burden upon the Treasury? If the appropriation had been made earlier, the money would have been called for sooner, and, although it is possible so large amounts would not be required at any one time, yet the general aggregate at the late period of the passage of the appropriation must be the same in either event. The delay to pass an appropriation bill has generally been considered a relief to the Treasury, and not an embarrassment, as it enables the Treasury to keep back amounts which would otherwise be called for.

I have already said, Mr. Speaker, that I concur entirely with the chairman in the opinion that the Treasury is greatly in need of the relief which this bill proposes. I do not doubt it in the least. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] reasoning from the Secretary's own statements, thinks otherwise; and I agree that the Secretary, in his strong solicitude to show, on the one hand, the prosperous condition of the finances, and on the other to exhibit some reasons for the passage of the bill, is in rather a perplexed condition, and perhaps does not make so clear a case of necessity as he well might do. Finding the measure was not likely to be adopted on the ground of "a permanent safeguard," he finally was obliged to recommend it on the other ground of a present necessity, a temporary measure, an anticipation of the revenue. Now, sir, what is the true state of the matter? The available means in the Treasury at the beginning of this month was about $1,300,000, and this scattered over every portion of the country, not readily to be collected together, and made available for any sudden emergency. Not more than two-thirds of it, says the Secretary, convenient for use to pay pensions and redeem Treasury notes. This is all we have in hand. The estimates of receipts for the ensuing three months may or may not prove correct. But, with this amount only in hand, we have two millions of Treasury notes soon falling due. At the beginning of this year, we had eleven millions of unexpended appropriations of last year, of which more than eight millions were to be expended within this year—appropriations already made, and for which the Treasury is liable any day to be called upon. The Secretary supposes the demand will be at the rate of $1,500,000 a month for three months to come. Besides, new appropriations must soon be made. The other Executive Departments are much pressed. I have reasons to believe, as the honorable chairman well knows, that the naval service is now suffering for want of means. Two ships of war are expected daily to arrive, and about $200,000 will be wanted to pay them off. Orders are understood to have been given, or soon to be given, to fit out three others, for which large sums are required.

Other payments, also, are now becoming due. Drafts upon some branches of the service, I have reason to believe, are now under protest for want of appropriations, and the moment any of the general appropriation bills pass, a heavy call, as we all know is usual, will be made upon the Treasury. Now, with so small an amount in hand, with receipts so uncertain, and, as I think, diminishing, how are we to meet these urgent and heavy demands? For one, sir, I do not desire to see the Treasury thus embarrassed and harassed—living from month to month and day to day, striving to conceal its poverty. I do not desire it should incur these hazards of insolvency to which it is perpetually exposed; and I could wish that the Executive Departments, instead of these temporary expedients, would boldly avow their real condition, and call upon Congress to furnish adequate means of supporting the Government, and maintaining the public credit. What reason have we to suppose that these expedients will stop here? That this is to be the last call for Treasury notes? We have no experience to justify such an expectation. What has been the history of the last three years upon this subject? The first issue of Treasury notes was authorized in October, 1837. We all know how reluctantly that was granted. It prevailed only on the ground of being a temporary measure, as it is now urged. It was nothing then but an anticipation of the revenue, as it is now. Ten millions were authorized. Of these, only about 4 300,000 were issued before the end of that year; and, in the annual report of the Secretary in December, 1837, he says:

"It now appears probable that during the next year, means will be possessed, without any permanent loans, recall of former deposites, or increase of taxes, sufficient to redeem seasonably the Treasury notes that become payable, as well as to meet all the ordinary appropriations.

"Nor is any occasion to keep out a great amount of these notes anticipated."

The President, also, in his message of the same time, says:

"The amount of Treasury notes which it will be necessary to issue during the year (1838) will, it is supposed, not exceed four and a half millions of dollars."

Well, sir, we are now in the third year; and what is the result? The Treasury notes have not all been redeemed yet; but, on the other hand, five millions more are wanted. The money due from the deposite banks, which amounted to more than twelve millions, and the withholding of which furnished the only apology for the necessity of issuing the notes, has been reduced to about $800,000, and still the notes are outstanding. Instead of issuing only, as the President supposed, four and a half millions in 1838, very near that amount was issued in the first quarter of that year; and, in the two next quarters, over eight millions more were issued, making over twelve million seven hundred thousand in the first three quarters of 1838. Although it was not then anticipated that there would be any occasion to keep out a great amount, it is now desired and proposed that five millions be put in circulation, with power to reissue them as fast as they come in, keeping a constant circulation to that extent, equal to one quarter of all the annual expenditures of the Government; and even this amount, I have no doubt, will be found insufficient.

With this experience before us, I confess I see no good reason to believe that the use of Treasury notes, as a resource to supply the Treasury, is to stop with this issue; on the other hand, I believe the country will next year find itself with a considerable debt, and an exhausted Treasury.

I am aware that the Secretary had very plausible reasons to assign for the disappointment of his expectations in 1838. The deficiency of the Treasury in the spring of that year which called for a new issue of notes was attributable, he says, to the fact that they were receivable for public dues, and that the chief payments being made in Treasury notes, and there being no power to reissue them, he was left without means to carry on the Government. Certainly they were receivable for public dues; and that was one of the chief recommendations of them. They were designed only to anticipate the revenue; and when they were redeemed by the public debtors, the Treasury was relieved from their redemption. They had accomplished their purpose; and it was only when they had fulfilled their functions of paying debts which we owed, and of being redeemed by the accruing revenue, as was expected and intended, that the Secretary began to perceive that this spending money in advance—this anticipation of revenue—was not exactly the thing "it was cracked up to be." In short, he found that it was anticipating his means of getting on with the ordinary operations of the Government, and hence he had to call for a fresh supply, for another temporary expedient, and he communicated his difficulties in a very laconic way.

"The peculiarity," says he, "in the present condition of the finances, can be very briefly explained. It has arisen not from any actual deficiency which has yet occurred in the amount of receipts anticipated for the year, nor from any excess of appropriations which has yet been made either for ordinary or extraordinary objects, but from a prohibition to use for the payment of the public dues what is required by law to be received for them."

Being required by law to receive Treasury notes, the complaint is that he could not use them in payment of public debts. But what was the fact? They had already been once paid out to public creditors—they had answered the purpose for which they were intended—they had anticipated the revenue; and now, forsooth, the complaint is that he cannot reissue them; in other words, that when the Treasury is bankrupt by reason of paying its debts, it has no power to contract new debts.

The "peculiarity" of which the Secretary speaks is precisely the "peculiarity" which every embarrassed debtor feels, who has no means of meeting a just claim, and cannot turn his creditor off with an old note which he has once taken up and cancelled. It would be quite a convenience certainly to most debtors, if, as fast as they take up one outstanding liability, they could reissue it in payment of some other debt immediately pressing, and so on, as fast as these evidences of indebtedness came in. It is a process, however, which nobody has yet been quite able to make available, except the Secretary, to whom this power was given, and is proposed again to be given by the present bill. This, sir, was in May, 1838. In March following, another emission was authorized; and now, in March, 1840, another demand is made; and always upon the ground of temporary measures. Sir, they begin to wear too much the appearance of permanency; and, as a permanent remedy, every body agrees, I suppose, that it is the worst, most expensive, and least convenient remedy that can be resorted to. I shall not go into a comparison between this mode of supplying the wants of the Treasury and others which have been suggested. The arguments against the use of Treasury notes, of Government paper money, have been very fully and very ably stated by other gentlemen. Our own history, and the history of other nations, admonishes us upon this subject. Eminent statesmen and financiers of our country have testified against it. Experience lifts her warning voice. But I wish simply to remark that it is a mode of present relief merely. It puts off the pressure for a single day. Being always receivable, these notes are always coming in, leaving the Treasury as destitute as it was before. The great embarrassments which the Treasury has labored under for three years have grown out of being deprived of other means, by the payment of so large a portion of the revenue in these notes. The communications of the Secretary are full upon this subject. The Treasury is perpetually exposed to "fluctuation" and contingency, and, if the system is to be continued, will often find itself in severe straits.

Gentlemen have spoken of these notes as only being issued in payment of public dues; but that is not their only use. Many of them are used "to borrow money upon." The act expressy authorizes it. If, then, we are to make a loan, is it not better to make it in the usual form, upon certificates of stock, which are not thus receivable in payment of revenue, but payable at the pleasure and convenience of the Government, instead of the holder? The means and resources of the Treasury will then always be understood, and something like certainty and regularity in its operations may be anticipated. But the objection to that mode is more nominal than real. It is said that that would be "a debt," and "a national debt is a national curse." Why, are not these very notes a national debt? Do we not owe them? Are we not to pay them? Has not money, in fact, been borrowed upon them? Have not loans been made upon them?

When the honorable chairman tells us that he is not making a loan, but is only anticipating revenue, does he not know that a large portion of former emissions have been used to borrow money on? Of the two millions now outstanding, a large proportion are now held by the banks.

[Mr. JONES here interposed, and said he did not know this to be the case, nor did he believe that such was the fact]

Mr. EVANS. A portion are undoubtedly still in circulation, but the exhibits lately made of the condition of some of the banks show that large amounts of those notes are in their possession. The Manhattan Bank for one, and others in Philadelphia. And that very fact has been assigned as one of the reasons of the present difficulties of these institutions.

Mr. JONES. I here state on authority which I cannot question, that there never has been an arrangement between the Secretary of the Treasury and any bank, that the notes shall be kept out one day. So far from it, the arrangement has been exactly the reverse. The Secretary has expressly reserved to himself the right to redeem the notes, even before they become due; and a large amount of them has actually been called in, and the interest on them saved.

Mr. EVANS. Called in? It may be so, but I desire to know whether a considerable portion of the notes have not been used to borrow upon? I do not say any arrangement has been entered into to keep them out. I know not how that is.

Mr. JONES. It is true the notes have in many instances been exchanged for specie, but whenever this has been done, the bank has always been required first to deposite the money in specie, subject to the Secretary's draft, before the notes have been given.

Mr. EVANS. That is what I understand. The mode of proceeding is this. The Secretary places an amount of notes in the banks. He says he has exchanged them for specie, but the fact is, he obtained a credit on the books of the bank, subject to his draft for the amount thus deposited. Upon this credit he draws, as the wants of the Government require. In some cases the holders of his drafts may perhaps obtain specie, but in most cases they have undoubtedly been paid in the notes of the bank.

Mr. JONES. My information is, that no Treasury note has been exchanged for bank paper, but that the bank has always deposited the specie before receiving the notes, and that they have always been received at par.

Mr. EVANS. The specie deposited? Where?

Mr. JONES. The bank has placed the amount to the credit of the Secretary.

Mr. EVANS Undoubtedly. Just so. That is what I say. The Secretary requires the Manhattan Bank, for example, to give him credit for half a million of dollars on their books. They do so. He has got credit for that amount, which, like all other credits, may be drawn out in specie, and for this he gives Treasury notes, and that the honorable gentleman calls exchanging Treasury notes for specie; but whether the Secretary's drafts shall be paid in specie is a matter to be arranged with the banks by the holder of the draft, and not by the Secretary of the Treasury. The bank receives the Treasury notes, and keeps them on deposite; the honorable chairman says that the Secretary never pays over par, but I ask if he leaves his credit or any part of it undrawn for any period? Does he not pay more than the amount of interest specified on the face of the notes? Does the bank advance the specie at the time the notes commence running, or does it hold it on deposite a considerable period while the interest is going on?

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will take the whole amount of interest paid on all the Treasury notes issued since 1837, he will find that it does not exceed four per cent. The money is not raised till it is needed.

Mr. EVANS. I can readily understand why the interest does not average over four per cent. Two and a half millions of these notes bore only an interest of two per cent. while something less than a million had an interest of one mill. Now, when you throw these into the aggregate, it reduces the average, of course; besides that, many of these notes come in early, in the payment of duties, and before much interest had accrued. I was much surprised to hear the chairman say that the Secretary has called back these notes and redeemed them, and thus saved interest, when every communication from the Department tells us that they have been forced on him in the payment of duties.

Mr. JONES. That is so. Of the three millions last issued, only two millions remained out on the first of January. The rest had been called back and redeemed.

Mr. EVANS. That is precisely what does not appear. They were not "called back," but came back in the payment of duties, against his will.

Mr. JONES. They were called back under the direction of the Secretary, as I think his statement shows.

Mr. EVANS. I am aware of no such statement —of no such fact. On the other hand, the Secretary has been perpetually embarrassed, because they have come in upon him so rapidly. It has been a source of annoyance to him; and quite sure I am there is no evidence that any of them have been redeemed, voluntarily, before maturity.

My object, in this part of my remarks, is, to show that this is not the most convenient mode of obtaining money. It is not denied that one cause, and a chief one, of the present emergency is, the liability of the Treasury to be called on for the redemption of the notes now outstanding. Both the Secretary and the honorable chairman himself admit this; and, so far, fortify the argument I am using.

In respect to the constitutional power of the Government to issue bills of this description, which was so ably argued by the honorable member from Georgia, [Mr. KING,] I confess, if this were a new question, I should feel considerable hesitation. But I consider that this has been practically settled by wise and eminent men, and sustained by public opinion. It is far better to enjoy the Constitution than to quarrel about it; to live under its wholesome provisions, and to give it strength and permanency, than to involve it in perpetual obscurity and doubt; and I agree so far with the argument of the honorable member from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL] He holds that some respect is due, upon questions of this sort, to the opinions and acts of preceding Congresses, quite as competent to judge upon constitutional questions as ourselves.

They afford in themselves, as he thinks, strong evidence for the constitutionality of any measure; at the same time I could wish that the honorable member would practise a little more on his own principles. I heard the same argument used not long ago in favor of an appropriation for the Cumberland road, by an honorable member from Indiana, [Mr. HOWARD,] and I am disposed, as far as possible, always, to yield to such authority. At the same time, I think I can put to both these gentlemen, who lay so much stress upon the argument, a case, where not only preceding Congresses, commencing with the first which assembled under the Constitution, embracing many of the framers of that instrument in its number, have established upon the fullest deliberation the constitutionality of a great public measure, a measure for a long period sustained by popular opinion, and finally confirmed as a constitutional act by the h ghest judicial tribunal of the country, in which both those honorable gentlemen will, at once, repudiate the argument to which, when it suits their purposes, they attach so much importance. I do not profess to know the exact opinions of either; but I hazard little in the surmise that both will be found denying the constitutional power of the Government to establish a National Bank. Waiving, therefore, all discussion of the constitutional power of Congress upon this subject, the only question for us is one of expediency. If I believed, with the honorable chairman, that the emergency is temporary only, and that the receipts of the year would be adequate to the expenditures and the redemption of the notes, and if I did not believe that this was to be an enduring and habitual resort of the Treasury, I might be quite willing to vote for this bill in preference to any other mode of supplying the Treasury; but, believing, as I do, that the practice will continue, and will increase from year to year, and desiring as I do, especially at this particular juncture, to see the Treasury better supplied and more ready to meet a great emergency should such arise, I should greatly have preferred earlier action, and a different mode. The chairman himself cannot but see that we are not now left free to choose. Here is a great public necessity, so great that the Department is anxious that the bill should pass this day. The chairman desires to get it out of committee to-night. The cry, at every interval, is question, question. Now, sir, does not this countenance the idea which the gentleman seemed so earnest to repel, that this bill is thrust upon us when we have no opportunity to resort to any other resource? I wish it were otherwise. I wish that the Treasury was in a condition to meet the exigencies which the wants of the coming year may cast upon it. I regret that the finances of the country have become so deranged, and that the prospect is so discouraging. Earlier attention should have been given to it; but, in the condition in which we find ourselves, I cannot consent to oppose any obstacle to the only measure of relief to the Treasury which we have the opportunity of granting. I cannot but hope, however, that the condition of the finances will attract more of the attention of the House than has hitherto been given to it, and that early measures may be adopted to render it healthy and stable.

SPEECH OF MR. WEBSTER,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In Senate, June 5, 1840—On Mr. Clay's motion to strike out the compulsory part of the Bankrupt Bill.

Mr. WEBSTER addressed the Senate as follows:

The commendable temper in which the discussion has been so far conducted leads me to hope that now, when we are in the midst of the difficulties of the question, the Senate will indulge me in a few remarks. That there are difficulties, I freely acknowledge. The subject of bankruptcies is a difficult subject every where, and perhaps particularly difficult here, as one of the results of a division of legislative powers between Congress and the States. But these difficulties are not insurmountable; and their only influence, therefore, should be to stimulate our efforts, and to increase at once our caution and our zeal.

It seems agreed, by all the friends of any bankrupt bill, that there shall be a provision for voluntary bankruptcy. The question now is, whether there ought to be also a compulsory power, or a power on the part of creditors to subject their debtors, in certain cases, to the operation of the law.

It is well known that the bill by me introduced contained such a power, and I should still prefer to retain it. But I do not think this of so much importance as some other gentlemen, and should cheerfully support a bill which should not contain it, if, by so doing, I should contribute to the general success of the measure. In truth, on this question and on many others, my vote will be governed by a desire to make the bill acceptable to others.

Now, sir, the argument for the compulsory clause is, that, without this power, the creditors have no security; that the bill is a one-sided measure—a measure for the benefit and relief of debtors only, quite regardless of the just rights of creditors. All this I deny. I maintain, on the contrary, not only that there is just security for the rights of creditors under the voluntary part of the bill, but that that part, of itself and by itself, is of the highest value and importance to creditors. This proposition takes for granted what I have no doubt will be found true—that persons in insolvent circumstances will generally become voluntary bankrupts; and, in the second place, I maintain that very little value is added to the security of creditors by the compulsory part of the bill.

These are the points on which I propose now particularly to address the Senate, and, with its patience, I hope to make them clear.

When I speak of creditors, I mean the class of creditors generally; or all who, in the course of business, give trust for merchandise or other things sold, or for money loaned.

When I speak of the creditors of insolvents, I mean the creditors, in the mass, of such persons as are actually and really insolvent; that is, unable to pay their debts, whether their insolvency be known and acknowledged or not.

And to creditors, and the rights of creditors, in both these senses and uses of the word, I maintain that the provisions contained in the voluntary part of this bill are of great value.

The rights of creditors are the means which the laws furnish for the enforcement and collection of their debts. In the case of an insolvent debtor, the laws at present give to the creditor, among other things, a right to pursue and demand his future earnings. This right the present bill proposes to take away.

The question is, therefore, whether, in taking away this right, the bill provides for the creditor any just equivalent.

I do not admit, indeed, that by a bankrupt law we might not take away some of the existing rights or remedies of creditors, if it should appear just and proper so to do, without providing any new right or remedy as an equivalent. The relation of debtor and creditor forms a general subject of legislation. The proper law-making power may act upon this relation, and alter and modify it, upon principles of general policy, justice, and utility, whenever it sees fit.

But I am willing to occupy a narrower ground, and to undertake to show that, by the provisions of this bill, we leave creditors in a better condition than we found them. In other words, that, as a voluntary system alone, it is beneficial to creditors.

The law, it is proposed, shall last some few years, that Congress and the country may see what is its actual operation. It will act immediately after it shall have passed; and this operation, as I maintain, will be favorable to creditors. In other words, the law will be useful to creditors in the creation of debts. It will, I insist, increase the probability that he who parts with his money or his merchandise on credit, will be paid for his merchandise or repaid his money. Sir, we live in a highly commercial country, and a highly commercial and enterprising age. The system of credit, which I hold to be very useful, and indeed essential to our general prosperity, may no doubt be carried to excess, and often is carried to excess. There is such a thing as overtrading, and such a thing as false credit; and both these things are public evils. All admit this; and many think the evils so great, that they seem to be enemies to the credit system altogether. I am not one of these; but still I desire to keep credit within bounds, and to avoid over-trading.

Now, sir, what is it that upholds so much false credit? What is it that enables men to extend their transactions so far beyond their capital? What is it that enables them, also, to go on, often for a long time, after they have become really insolvent? Sir, it is the practice of endorsement and suretyship; a practice, I venture to say, more extensive in the United States than in any other country. Men get trust upon the strength of other men's names. I do not speak of the discount of notes and bills taken in the common operations of sale and purchase, but I speak of pure accommodation; of the discount of paper representing no transaction of sale or purchase, but made for borrowing money merely, and endorsed for the sole accommodation of the borrower. That great excesses have been committed in operations of this kind, no man who has attended to the transactions of trade can doubt; nor can any one doubt that great evils arise from this source. Endorsement and suretyship, therefore, are the means by which excessive and false credit is upholden. And how is this endorsement obtained? This leads us one step further in the inquiry. How is it that persons continuing to carry on business after they are really insolvent, and are suspected if not known to be so, can procure others to endorse their paper? Sir, we all know how it is. It is by promising to secure endorsers at all events. It is by giving an assurance that, if the party stops, a preference shall be made, and the favored creditors shall be his endorsers. Hence it is quite general, perhaps almost universal, that when an insolvent assigns his property for the benefit of his creditors, he classifies his creditors, and puts endorsers into the first class. This has become a sort of honorary law. A man that disregards it is in some measure disgraced. We hear daily of honorary debts, and we hear reproaches against those who, being insolvent, have yet pushed on, in the hope of retrieving their affairs, until, when failure does come, (and come it does, sooner or later,) they have not enough left to discharge these honorary obligations. Now, at the bottom of all this is preference. The preference of one creditor to another, both debts being honest, is allowed by the general rules of law; but is not allowed by bankrupt laws. And this right of preference is the foundation on which the structure rests.

On the legal right or power of preference lies the promise of preference.

On the promise of preference lies endorsement.

On endorsement lies excessive and false credit.

On excessive and false credit lies over-trading.

This, sir, is the regular stratification. If we strike out preference, we shall knock away the foundation stone; and this bill will strike it out.

If this bill shall pass, every endorser who shall not take previous security will see that, in case of failure, he can no longer be protected or preferred, but must come in for his share, and his share only, with other creditors. And this is right. For one, I have always thought that, if any difference were to be made, endorsers should be paid last—because they come in as volunteers, they profess to run a risk. They are not giving credit in the common way, as other persons do who sell on trust, in the ordinary way of business, and in order to earn their livelihood. But they assume a voluntary responsibility; and why should they be preferred to the grocer, the tailor, or the butcher, who has only dealt in the common way of his trade, and has not volunteered to give any trust or credit whatever? Well, sir, will not endorsement stay its hand when this bill shall have taken away all power of preference? Will not men hesitate, more than they now do, about lending their names, when they find that, in case of failure, they must come in for neighbor's fare with all other creditors? I think they will.

And, sir, if there be less of endorsement, there will be less of fictitious credit and less of over trading. Every man's business will be brought down so much the nearer to his own property, his own capital, and his own means. And if every trading man's business be brought down to some nearer proportion to his own capital and his own means, does not this diminish the probability of his failure? Certainly it does; and therefore whoever deals with him and trusts him is not so likely to lose his debt. There will be more general security in giving credits; and, therefore, I say that if you take away the power and practice of preference, you affect, to some extent, false credit and over-trading, and, by these means, you give a security to the creditor, even in the creation of his debt; and this is one advantage to the whole class of creditors to be expected from this bill. It is a general advantage, and its precise amount cannot be stated; but it is a clear advantage nevertheless.

But there is a second, and a still greater advantage.

Mr. President, allow me to ask, what is that feature—the culpable feature—which we most often see in the insolvencies which take place among the trading classes? What is that which there is the more frequent occasion to regret and to reprehend? Is it not, that the party has gone on too long? Is it not, that after he knew himself to be really insolvent—that is, after he knew he had not property enough left to pay his debts—instead of stopping, and winding up his concerns, he has ventured still deeper, and made his ultimate case thereby still more desperate? Under the present state of law, this happens quite too often. I am afraid it will be found, on inquiry, that failures are generally worse in this country than elsewhere; that is to say, that generally the amount of assets is less in proportion to the amount of debts.

And, in my opinion, the present state of the law encourages and produces this very result. For, sir, let me ask, what will a man naturally do, who has been unfortunate, and has sustained such losses as to bring his property below his debts, while this is known to himself and not known to others? If he stops and surrenders, however honestly and fairly, he cannot be sure of a discharge, and the unpaid balance may keep him a pauper for life. On the other hand, he sees that another voyage, another speculation, some new turn of fortune, may possibly relieve him, and bring him out a man of property.

On one side, poverty for life is his only prospect, and only destiny—so far, at least, as the law allows him any ground of hope; and on the other, there is some chance of escape. Now, sir, I will ask any sensible man, if a state of law could be devised more likely to encourage headlong enterprise and rash speculation? Can you place a man in a condition where he will be more likely to throw himself upon desperate chances, and to plunge deeper and deeper?

We are not without experience on this point, and much instruction may be gathered from one memorable instance. The great fire in New York is supposed to have destroyed property to the amount of twenty or twenty-five millions of dollars, in houses, warehouses, and merchandise. But nobody failed. This is a fact full of admonition. I pray attention to it. Nobody failed, notwithstanding this immense loss of property. And what was the reason? No one doubts that hundreds were rendered deeply insolvent by this so extensive calamity. Why, then, did they not stop? The answer is, that the extent of their losses was, in many cases, known only to themselves, and they concealed their own true condition. And they had strong motives so to do. If they announced themselves insolvent and stopped, nothing was before them and their families for their whole lives but poverty and distress. On the other hand, there was a possibility of hope that, if they could maintain their credit, they might, by extreme exertion and extreme good fortune, extricate themselves. On the strength of that hope, slight as it was, they buoyed themselves up, and tried to stem the current which was carrying them, notwithstanding all their struggles, to utter and desperate bankruptcy. They paid exorbitant interest for money; they suffered themselves to be jewed in every dark alley in the city; they sacrificed every thing to maintain their credit, and, in the end, when every thing else was gone, credit went also. And when they finally failed, where was the fund for dividend to creditors? Why, sir, it had gone to the pocket of the capitalist; it had been devoured by the voracity of usury. I know of one instance in which a merchant paid more than fifty thousand dollars, extra and unlawful interest, for the purpose of upholding his credit; and failed after all. And there are well-authenticated cases of the payment of still larger sums. Boundless extras and cool exorbitancy were thus suffered to eat up what belonged to creditors.

Now, sir, would it not have been much better for all parties and for the public that these unfortunate persons should have stopped payment the morning after the fire, assigned all that was left of their property, and received a discharge? And this, be assured, many of them would have done if the law had provided that by so doing they might have obtained that discharge. But there was no such legal provision; they had no hope on that side, but from the consent of all their creditors; and they believed that all would not consent, and therefore there was no way left to them but to keep on, wading into deeper water at every step, and stopping at last, with nothing to divide save among endorsers.

Mr. President, we hear it frequently said that all honest debtors may always obtain discharges from their creditors upon an honest assignment of their effects. This is the language of the memorial of the Board of Trade, and this is the language, especially, of the letter to the honorable member from New York, which has been read. Sir, such is not my opinion, nor the fruit of my experience. I believe that creditors are generally humane and just; but there will be some, always, or often, who are selfish, unjust, or indifferent. There will be some, often, who will not compound. The man, therefore, who would stop, since he knows he is insolvent, if he could be sure of a discharge, cannot be sure of it. He may be as honest as possible; he may strip himself of the last farthing; but yet he cannot promise himself any release. It is notorious that some creditors will and do hold on; and as to the debtor, this is as decisive as if all did so.

Now, sir, this bill proposes an object to a man whose circumstances have become insolvent, and makes that object sure. It tells him, by way of inducing him to stop in season, and before he has wasted his property, that, by assigning, and acting honestly in all things, he shall have a discharge; that no unreasonable creditor shall be able to prevent it; and with this certainty before him, he will stop in season, or, at least, is much more likely to stop in season than he is at present.

This, then, sir, is the second benefit which this bill confers on creditors. And who will deny that it is a clear and a great benefit? It holds out a strong inducement to debtors to stop in season, and to distribute their property honestly, while they have yet property to distribute, and before they have wasted it all in useless sacrifices to retrieve their affairs.

But there is a third benefit which this bill confers on creditors. It takes away the power and the motive of concealment. Under the present state of things, the motives of an insolvent man lead in the opposite direction of his duties. Every thing is brought to bear against his honesty and integrity. He has every temptation to conceal his property; and there are many ways in which he may conceal it. If he surrenders all, he cannot be discharged, and, therefore, will be in no condition to earn any thing more. He may, therefore, not choose to surrender, and may set his creditors at defiance. I have heard of an instance in which a man failed for one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and he showed assets to the amount of eighty thousand, and there was no reason to suppose that he had any more, or had acted dishonestly in any way. He offered to give all up for a discharge; but while most of his creditors were willing to discharge him on such a surrender, some were not. A year afterwards he renewed his offer of giving up all, but his property had by this time become diminished by ten thousand dollars, so that he had but seventy thousand to offer; and the obstinate creditors of last year were now willing to take what was then offered, but would not take less; and so the process of offer and refusal went on; and the last I heard of the case, this proceeding was likely to result in the creditor's getting nothing, and the debtor's becoming a beggar.

If there be not many cases exactly like this, or quite so strong in all their circumstances, there are still very many which much resemble it; and this bill will put an end to them all.

Sir, the great power by which the debtor is to be moved to act honestly and fairly, is his hope of a discharge. This is to him every thing. Hardly any earthly object, in his view, can be greater. It is this which is to reinstate him in a condition of effort and action. Creditors can obtain a benefit, by means of this, far superior to any good which they can ever get by holding on to his future earnings. Generally, this last right is good for nothing to the mass of creditors, though sometimes an individual may profit by it. In some cases, it is true, where the amount of debt is small, the bankrupt will struggle hard to earn the means of payment, that he may afterwards work for himself. But if the amount be large, he will make no such effort. He will not work altogether for his creditors. Not only will he not do that, but, as I have already said, he is under strong temptation to retain and conceal what he already possesses. I need not say of what evil consequence all this is. I need not say what ill-will naturally grows up between debtors and creditors standing in this relation. The creditor thinks his debtor unjust and roguish; the debtor regards his creditor as remorseless and cruel; and mutual reproaches and deep bitterness of feeling are often the result. How much better, sir—how much better every way, that the law, by its timely interference, should give the debtor's property to whom it belongs, and set him free to begin a new career of industry and usefulness!

And in the fourth place, sir, this bill gives the creditors an equal distribution of the debtor's effects. In the present state of things, a bankrupt may pay one creditor all, and another nothing; and he who gets nothing may, perhaps, fail himself, when, if he could have received his just proportion, he might have been saved. The great interest of the mass of creditors is, that the debtor's effects shall be equally divided among them all. At present, there is no security for such equal division, and this bill proposes to give that security. And I repeat, that if any thing ever comes of the power of a creditor to hold on upon his debt, in the hope of getting something out of the future earnings of a notoriously insolvent debtor, it is usually not the mass of creditors, but only some one of them who gets any thing; and that one, very likely, may be he who deserves least.

These, Mr. President, are the securities, the new securities, the important securities, which this bill furnishes to the creditors. If there be nothing in them, let that be shown; but until it is shown, let it not be said that there is nothing in this bill for the creditor's benefit.

And, Mr. President, these provisions belong to the voluntary as well as the involuntary parts of the bill. The real reciprocity, the real equivalent, must be looked for in the provisions made for conducting the proceedings, and not in the source in which the proceedings originate. Suppose creditors to have ever so full a power of declaring their debtors bankrupts: this would not avail them, unless proper provisions were made for a full assignment and fair distribution of the property.

On the other hand, if such provisions be made, the creditor is secured, although the proceedings originate with the debtor himself. It may be wise, or it may be unwise, to retain the coercive clauses; but, whether retained or not, they do not constitute the true equivalent or reciprocal benefit of the creditor. The real state of the case stands thus: the benefit of a debtor consists in obtaining a discharge; this he shall have; but, in order to obtain it, he shall give the creditors the benefits of a full and honest surrender of all his property; he shall show, if a merchant, that he has kept proper and regular books of account; it must not appear that there has been any false swearing on his part, or the concealment of any part of his property; or that he has admitted any false or fictitious debt against his estate; or that he has applied any trust money to his own use; or that he has paid any debt by way of preferring one creditor to another, in contemplation of bankruptcy. And the Senate, if they see fit, may insert that the consent of creditors should be necessary to his discharge; though, for one, I should never consent to that, without reserving a right to the debtor to summon dissenting creditors to appear before the proper tribunal, and show some just reason for withholding their assent.

I have now, sir, gone through with all that I proposed to say upon the voluntary part of this bill. My undertaking was to show that that part of the bill does by itself, and of and in itself alone, contain provisions of the highest importance to creditors, and the security of creditors; and on the various points which I have noticed, I am ready to meet any gentleman who may choose to contest the matter. The opinions which I have expressed I hold with confidence, and am willing to defend them, and to submit them to the judgment of all men of experience.

My second general proposition was, that whether it were advisable on the whole, or not, to retain the compulsory part, yet that that part did not give any important addition to the security of creditors; and that therefore it was not of great consequence whether it be retained or not.

In the first place, let us remember that the form of proceeding is the same, after its commencement, whether it be begun by the debtor or his creditor. If there be any benefit to the creditor at all in the compulsory part, it must be in the mere power of declaring his debtor a bankrupt under certain circumstances, and of making him, willing or unwilling, go through the bankrupt process. Now the difficulty is, that though this power might sometimes be beneficial to the creditor, yet it is next to impossible so to describe the circumstances which shall constitute a just occasion for the exercise of the power, as not to leave it still, in a great measure, a voluntary matter with the debtor when he will subject himself to the provisions of the law. This has been found the difficulty in all systems, and most bankruptcies are therefore now substantially voluntary. Those acts which are, in this bill, called acts of bankruptcy, and which, if committed, shall enable a creditor to sue out a commission against his debtor, are, nearly all of them, voluntary acts, which the debtor may perform or not, at his pleasure; and which of course he will not perform, if he wishes to avoid the process of bankruptcy.

These acts, as stated in the bill, are, secretly departing from the State, with intent to defraud his creditors; fraudulently procuring himself to be arrested, or his lands and goods attached or taken in execution; removing or concealing his goods, to prevent their being levied upon or taken by legal process; making any fraudulent conveyance of his lands or goods; lying in jail twenty days for want of bail; or escaping from jail, or not giving security according to law when his lands or effects shall be attached by process.

Most of these acts an insolvent may avoid the commission of, if he choose, especially as there are now few instances of inprisonment for debt. The acts of bankruptcy, according to the British statute, are very much like those in this bill. But a trader may declare himself insolvent, and thereupon a commission may issue against him; and that is supposed to be now the common course. Creditors will seldom, if ever, use this power. A creditor desirous of proceeding against his debtor for payment or security, naturally acts for himself alone. He arrests his person, attaches his property, (if the law allows that to be done,) or gets security for his own debt the best way he can, leaving others to look out for themselves. Concert among creditors, in such cases, is not necessary and is uncommon; and a single creditor, acting for himself only, is much more likely to take other means for the security of his debt than that of putting his debtor into bankruptcy. Nevertheless, I admit there are possible cases in which the power might be useful. I admit it would be well if creditors could sometimes stop the career of their debtors; and if the honorable member from New York, or any other gentleman, can frame a clause for that purpose, at once efficient and safe, I shall vote for it. Even as these clauses now stand, I should prefer to have them in the bill, my original proposition having been, as is well known, that there should be both compulsory and voluntary bankruptcy; and I vote now to strike the provision out, only because others, I find, object to it, and because I do not think it of any great importance.

I proceed, sir, to take some notice of the remarks of the honorable member from New York; and what I have first to say is, that his speech appeared to me to be a speech against the whole bill, rather than a speech in favor of retaining the compulsory clause. He pointed out the evils that might arise from the voluntary part of the bill; but every one of them might arise, too, under the other part. He spoke of the hardship to creditors in New York—that they should be obliged to take notice of the insolvency of their debtors in the Western States, and to go thither to prove their debts or resist the discharge. But this hardship, certainly, is no greater when the western debtor declares himself bankrupt, than when he commits an act of bankruptcy, on which some western creditor sues out a commission against him.

All the other inconveniences, dangers, or hardships to creditors, which the honorable gentleman enumerated, were, in like manner, so far as I recollect, as likely to arise when a creditor puts the debtor into bankruptcy, as when he puts himself in. The gentleman's argument, therefore, is an argument against the whole bill. He thinks eastern creditors of western debtors will be endangered, because State Legislatures, in States where debtors live, as well as commissioners, assignees, &c., will have all their sympathies on the side of the debtors. Why, sir, State Legislatures will have nothing to do with the matter, under this bill; and, as to the rest, how is it now? Are not creditors now in the power of local administrations, affected, in all respects, by these same sympathies? Are there no instances, indeed, and is there no danger of laws, staying process, embarrasing remedies, or otherwise interrupting the regular course of legal collection? For my own part, I cannot doubt that a New York merchant, learning that his debtor in the south or west was in insolvent or failing circumstances, would prefer that his affairs should be settled in bankruptcy, in the courts of the United States, much sooner than that he should settle them himself, paying whom he pleased, and disposing of his property according to his own will, or under the administration of the insolvent laws of the State.

The gentleman seemed to fear that, if western traders may make themselves bankrupts, New York merchants will be shy of them, and that western credit will be impaired or checked. Perhaps there would be no great harm, if this should be so. A little more caution might not be unprofitable; but the answer to all such suggestions is, that the bill applies only to cases of insolvents—actual, real insolvents; and when traders are actually insolvent, the sooner it is known the better, nine times out of ten. Nor do I feel any alarm for our mercantile credit abroad, which has awakened the fears of the gentleman. What can foreign merchants suppose better for them than such an administration of the effects of debtors here, as that, if there be foreign creditors, they shall be sure of a just and equal dividend, without preference either to creditors at home or endorsers? It is not long since, in some of the States—I hope it is not so anywhere now—that creditors within the State had preference over creditors out of it. And, if we look to other countries, do we find that well-administered systems of bankruptcy enfeeble or impair mercantile credit? Is it so in regard to England or to France?

The honorable member feels alarm, too, lest the banks should be great sufferers under the operation of this bill. He is apprehensive that if it shall pass, very many debtors of the banks will become bankrupts, pay other creditors more or less, and pay the banks nothing. Sir, this is not according to my observation. Bank debts are usually preferred debts, because they are debts secured by endorsement. But, by mentioning the case of the banks, the gentleman has suggested ideas which I have long entertained, and which I am glad of this opportunity to express briefly, though I shall not dwell on them.

Sir, a great part of the credit of the country is bank credit. A great part of all endorsement and suretyship is bank endorsement and bank suretyship. I do not speak particularly of the great cities: I speak of the country generally. Now, endorsement, as I have already said, rests on the idea of preference. And if we take away preference, do we not diminish bank endorsement and bank accommodation? And do we not, in this way, act directly on the quantity of bank paper issued for circulation? Do we not keep the issues of paper nearer to the real wants of society? This view of the case might be pressed and amplified. There is much in it, if I am not mistaken. For the present, I only suggest it; but he who shall consider the subject longest and deepest, will be most thoroughly convinced that in this respect, as well as others, the abolition of preference to endorsers will act beneficially to the public.

The immediate motion before the Senate, Mr. President, does not justify a further extension of my observations on this part of the case. My object has been to prove that this bill is not one-sided—is not a bill for debtors only; but is what it ought to be—a bill making just, honest, and reasonable provisions for the distribution of the effects of insolvents among their creditors; and that the voluntary part of the bill alone secures all these principal objects, because, in the great and over-ruling motive of obtaining a discharge, it holds out an object to debtors who know themselves to be involvent to stop, to stop seasonably, to assign honestly, and to conform in good faith to all the provisions intended for the security of their creditors.

SPEECH OF MR. CLAY, OF KENTUCKY,

In Senate, June 4, 1840.—On his motion to strike out the compulsory part of the Bankrupt Bill.

Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky, said that the portion of the debate on this measure, which he had the benefit of hearing, and he learnt that the residue of it, (what he had regretted that he had bee nprevented by indisposition from profiting by,) had been conducted with good temper, ability, and dignity. Perhaps, if he had been able to listen to the whole, he would not now trespass upon the attention of the Senate, but he promised not to detain it long.

The power invested in Congress by the Constitution (continued Mr. CLAY) to establish uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States, is a feature in the scheme of the General Government somewhat at variance with its general character. Its predominant principle is, with only a few exceptions, to assume the regulation of the general concerns of the whole Union, and to leave to the respective States the care of local or particular interests. The States retain the power of providing for the transfer and succession of property of all kinds, and for the enforcement of the obligations and duties incident to all private relations, including that of creditor and debtor. In the few instances in which the Federal Judiciary is charged with jurisdiction over the latter relation, the object is to secure an impartial administration of the laws of the several States themselves, rather than the Federal laws.

The motive with the convention which formed the Constitution for engrafting this power in it was, to secure uniformity in the bankrupt laws prevailing throughout the United States. Now, I do not think that this motive was sufficient to authorize the delegation of the power. There is no greater necessity for it than there is for uniformity in other matters, which unquestionably belong exclusively to State legislation. The States decide what shall be the subjects of property, how it shall be alienated during life, or distributed after death; what shall be taken by, or exempted from, creditors on execution; and to what State or local taxes it shall be liable. The laws of the States are various on these subjects, and no great inconvenience has been practically experienced from this variety. None would have resulted from the passage of different bankrupt laws in the several States. At least, the advantage of uniformity is more than counterbalanced by the difficulty and disadvantage of adapting Federal legislation to the various wants and peculiarities of twenty-six States. If, therefore, the question now was, whether it be expedient or not to confer on Congress the power, I should vote in the negative.

I shall attempt no precise definition of the phrases bankruptcy and insolvency which are certainly generally used, in the vernacular language, in a synonymous sense. I prefer to describe the properties or qualities of each system. That of insolvency requires a full surrender of all the property and credits of the debtor, takes the administration of them out of his hands, distributes them by a third party among his creditors, and, finally, after an honest compliance with the provisions of the system, exonerates the person of the debtor from all arrest or imprisonment on account of pre existing debts. The system does not, it is generally supposed, discharge his future acquisitions from liability. The bankrupt system too exacts a full surrender of the property and credits of the debtor, takes the administration of them out of his hands, confides the distribution of them amongst his creditors to a third party, and, finally, after an honest and faithful compliance with the requirements of the system, exonerates both the person of the debtor from all arrests and imprisonment, and his future acquisitions from all liability on account of all debts and contracts existing at the period of the commission of the act of bankruptcy.

Thus, it will be perceived that, on most points, there is a strong resemblance between the two systems. The essential and characteristic difference between them is, that the system of insolvency does not, or rather is supposed to be incompetent to, grant; whilst the bankrupt system can confer, an effectual discharge of the debtor from all pre-existing debts and obligations. That imcompetency of the States to provide, in their systems of insolvency, for such a discharge, is supposed to result from that prohibition to the States, in the Constitution of the United States, against their passage of any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

If the several States could pass constitutional laws of bankruptcy adapted to their respective wants and conditions, I should be averse to the exercise of the power by the General Government. But the States have voluntarily imposed on themselves restraints, and tied their hands.

Mr. President, power and duty are often synonymous. The possession of the exclusive power to pass laws on the subject of bankruptcies by the General Government, draws after it a high and responsible obligation and duty to the States, to the Union, and to the people, the performance of which that Government is not at liberty to elude or neglect. The right of the State (I use the term in its broadest sense) to the use of the unimpaired faculties of its citizens as producers, as consumers, and as defenders of the commonwealth, is paramount to any rights or relations which can be created between citizen and citizen. But an honest and unfortunate debtor, borne down by a hopeless mass of debt, from beneath which he can never rise, is prostrated and paralyzed, and rendered utterly incapable of performing his duties to his family or his country. To say nothing of the dictates of humanity; nothing of the duties of a parental Government to lift up the depressed, to heal the wounds, and cheer and encourage the unhappy man who sees in the past, without his fault, nothing but ruin and embarrassment, and, in the future, nothing but gloom and despair, I maintain that the public right of the State, in all the faculties of its members, moral and physical, is paramount to any supposed rights which appertain to a private creditor. This is the great principle which lies at the bottom of all bankrupt laws, and it is this which gives to the States the right to demand the passage, and imposes upon Congress the duty of enacting a bankrupt system.

The number of bankrupts now in the United States has been estimated, by respectable authority, as high as five hundred thousand, and, with their families and connexions, the total number of all who are interested in the passage of a bankrupt system, has been stated as large as two millions. I hope and believe that this is an exaggerated estimate. But the number is undoubtedly very great, be it what it may; and it comprehends many of our most active, enterprising, and intelligent citizens. Who can think of them without the liveliest sympathy in their present hopeless condition! Without being irresistibly prompted to exercise all the powers with which we are constitutionally invested, to raise them up from the depths of despair in which they lie, and bring them back to the enjoyment of life, the support of their families, and the service of their country!

In the execution of many of the powers of this Government—certainly in the exercise of the bankrupt power, improvidently, as I think, granted—we should constantly bear in mind the distribution of legislative authority, in the United States, between the several States and the General Government. In England and in France, all the powers of legislation are concentrated in Parliament or in the Chambers. Whenever, therefore, either of those legislative bodies undertakes to pass a bankrupt system, it must provide, by the minutest details, for the rights of both creditors and debtors, or no provision will exist for them. But it is otherwise in the United States. Here, the powers of legislation are divided between the States and General Government; and that of the States is competent to make full and adequate provision for all the interests of both creditors and debtors, except in the sole matter of granting an effectual discharge to the debtor. The States can enact, and most of them have enacted, suitable laws, by which all the property and credits of the debtor can be reached, surrendered, and distributed, and frauds and fraudulent transfers effectually guarded against. The very section which I have moved to strike out, embracing compulsory bankruptcies, is, I understand, a substantial copy from the insolvent system of one of the States. There is, therefore, no necessity for Federal legislation in behalf of the creditor. His rights are secured by the laws of the States. But, if I should be convinced that the States have not fully legislated for him, and are incompetent to make full provision for his case, I am ready to concur in the passage of any just law, within the power of Congress, to render to him complete justice. For no one is more sensible than I am of the delicacy and caution with which the relation of debtor and creditor should be touched, nor of the duty of guarding the legitimate interests of both parties. But, whatever the States are authorized to do in relation to their rights, they should be left to perform, as being better judges than Congress is of the local wants and necessities of their respective communities.

This distribution of the power of legislation in our systems of Government, suggests, therefore, the rule which I think ought to govern the Senate, and which will guide me, in carrying into effect the power delegated to Congress to pass bankrupt laws. That rule is, that the extent of the measure of Federal legislation should be limited by the extent of the deficiency of State authority to provide for the exigency. But the States have provided, or can provide, for the creditor. As I have already shown, their systems of insolvency cover all the ground occupied by a bankrupt law, except in one particular. Perhaps, also, the States cannot destroy fair and bona fide preferences created by the debtor, and enforce an equal distribution of his effects among all his creditors, without respect to liens, or the dignity or priority of debts. But it is far from being entirely certain that such a power ought to be exercised, if it be possessed by Congress. Against prospective preferences or liens it is equally competent both to Federal and State legislation to provide.

Seeing, therefore, that the States have provided, or can provide, all proper remedies for the enforcement of the rights and the security of the interests of the creditor, I am not aware of the necessity of any legislation in his behalf by Congress. But the States cannot authorize—at least the general impression is that they cannot authorize—an effectual discharge of an honest debtor from all his existing debts, after he shall have made a fair and full surrender of all his effects. Hence the necessity, and the exact extent of the necessity, of Federal legislation. If the insolvent laws in all the States were uniform, it would then only be necessary for Congress to pass a short act, with a single section, declaring that, in all instances where the debtor had honestly and faithfully complied with the provisions of the insolvent act, he should be entitled to a discharge. The power vested in Congress being, to pass uniform laws, and the insolvent laws of the States not possessing that requisite quality, it becomes necessary for Congress to establish a system, in detail, to operate alike throughout the United States.

It is upon this, as well as other grounds, that I was opposed to including corporations in this bill, and voted to strike them out. Generally, their capital and their existence are identical; and, after the seizure and distribution of their effects, they would be defunct, and there would be no occasion for that discharge, which constitutes, it seems to me, the sole motive for Federal legislation in the case of individuals.

But there are other, and more weighty, considerations for excluding corporations from the bill. If you begin with one class of them, you must follow the principle of their insolvency, upon which you profess to act, into all other classes to which it will carry you; and if you do not pursue it, when it is once established, our successors will be sure to follow it. You begin with the banking incorporations. They have incurred your displeasure. You pronounce them insolvent, and you would put them down. But, if the non-payment of debts by that description of corporations justly subjects them to the operation of a bankrupt system, the failure of any other corporations to discharge their debts would also bring them within its operation. All incorporated turnpike companies, all railroad companies, all manufacturing companies, all incorporated religious and literary institutions—the Virginia James River Company, the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company—in short, all incorporations, for any purpose whatever, which happened to suspend payment of their debts, would be brought within the operation of this system. Indeed, the clause, relating to incorporations, which has been stricken out, if it had been retained, according to the vote of a considerable number of Senators, would have comprehended the James River Company, the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, and the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company; each of which, if I have been rightly informed, has issued paper, circulating to some extent as currency, which is not redeemed in specie.

Limited to banks, what an immense mass of debts and effects would be transferred from the State to Federal jurisdiction! Extended to all incorporations which might be drawn within its scope, the imagination can hardly conceive the amount of property and debts which would be so transferred. It would be many hundreds of millions of dollars. But, vast as the amount would be, it would be nothing in comparison to the political effects upon the character of our systems of Government, which would result from such a substitution of the Federal to the local jurisdiction. Such an exercise of power, by a single step, would make a greater and more alarming progress towards consolidation than all other measures together, which have been proposed or adopted since the origin of the Government, to which the imputation of that tendency has been made. I am not prepared to take such a frightful step. I shudder at the mere contemplation of it.

Mr. President, I mean to express no opinion, pro or con, on the question, whether the bankrupt power in the Constitution does, or does not, comprehend an authority in Congress to include corporations. I neither deny nor admit the existence of that authority. And I express no opinion; because, if there were a clear and definite grant of such an authority, I should be decidedly opposed to its exercise, since, in my deliberate judgment, there is no occasion—none whatever—for its exercise by this Government. Or, I should rather say that the States themselves are much more competent than Congress is to exercise all necessary and proper jurisdiction over corporations, and that the assumption of a jurisdiction over them by Congress would be incalculably dangerous, alarming, and mischievous.

Corporations are artificial beings, created by the States according to their respective views of their own local policy and interests. They know when it is best to make or abolish them. And to them should be left, undisturbed, the power of compelling these corporations to fulfil all the purposes of their creation, and to perform all the duties and obligations which appertain to them.

Assuming the necessity of terminating the existence of these corporations, winding up their affairs, and administering their effects, which is the best system—that provided for by this bill, or that which the States might choose to apply? What is the system of the bill? It proposes, upon the occurrence of specified acts of bankruptcy, to seize all the effects of the corporation, and to place them, in the first instance, in the hands of a receiver appointed by a federal tribunal, from whom they are afterwards to be passed over to assignees. Neither the receiver nor assignees are required to give any security whatever for the safe custody and faithful application of the effects. What receiver or assignee, indeed, could possibly find adequate security for the millions, of which the capital of some banks consists, and which would be confided to their care? Have we not been sufficiently taught, by sad experience, that it is utterly unsafe to intrust such immense sums with any individual? What would a receiver or assignees do with the stupendous works of the James River Company, the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, or the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company?

In many of the incorporations, the several States have, as shareholders, made large investments. In some, they are the exclusive owners of the banks. How would they like to see the debts and effects of those banks wrested from their possession, and administered by a receiver or assignees appointed by Federal authority?

Looking, therefore, merely to fitness and propriety, I have no hesitation in expressing my thorough conviction that it would be an unwise and perilous exercise of federal authority to assume jurisdiction over State corporations, so as to terminate their existence and administer their effects, if they were expressly comprehended in the grant of the bankrupt power. I think that their control and management, and the distribution of their funds, can be far better effected by the respective States which have created them, than by the legislation of the Federal Government. And the great and controlling motive of granting to the honest and unfortunate debtor an effectual discharge, without which I should be opposed to any legislation by Congress on the subject of bankruptcies, has no application whatever to corporations.

I will now say a few words on the particular amendment which I have submitted, to strike out the section which provides for the case of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcies. Three considerations appear to me to unite in recommending the adoption of that amendment. 1st. Such a coercive system is opposed to the habits and genius of the country. It might answer for the large commercial cities, but is not adapted to other parts of the country. In large portions of the Union the interior merchant and trader are accustomed to give extensive credits, waiting for payment until the farmer or planter realizes the sales of his growing crop. But the uncertainty of the seasons and the markets frequently occasions disappointment in the collection of debts of the most undoubted character. Hence the merchant may be disabled punctually to comply with his engagements, although his ultimate ability is beyond all doubt. And it would be a case of extreme hardship to divest him, on account of a temporary delinquency, without his fault, of the careful and prudent management of his own property, and transfer it to the custody of a receiver or assignees, whose chief solicitude might be their own commissions and fees.

Any bankrupt system, originating with Congress, is an experiment. It has been forty years since one was enacted, and it had but a short and unsatisfactory existence. I think, therefore, that, in renewing it, we had better begin with a simple principle, clear and well defined, and in respect to which all are united.

2dly. All the acts specified in the compulsory section proposed to be stricken out, as evidence of bankruptcy, are already provided for by the laws of some of the States, and are susceptible of provision by all the States.

And, 3dly. If the involuntary system be desirable, it ought not to be included in this bill, but should be introduced in a separate bill, as was proposed by the majority of the Judiciary Committee. All who are in favor of any bankrupt bill are agreed as to the voluntary class; and the Senate, by a vote almost unanimous, decided to give it the most comprehensive extent. But they do not concur as to the involuntary class. There is great division of opinion among the friends of some bankrupt system as to the propriety of rendering it coercive. Why, then, confound the two classes together in the same bill? Why not let each stand by itself, on its own merits, in distinct bills? Why combine an uncontested principle with one which is doubtful and contested? Is it right to make a right measure drag a disputed one through the Senate? Do not the friends of the involuntary principle, by insisting on the union of the two, demonstrate that their purpose is to defeat a bill altogether, or that they are unwilling to subject their principle to the test of its own unassisted merits?

I think that the bill ought to be limited to the voluntary class exclusively. It has been argued that in that case, it would be a mere insolvent law. Not so, if I am right in supposing that the characterstic difference between a system of insolvency and a system of bankruptcy is the discharge of the debtor.

It has been further argued by the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) that the power granted in the Constitution must be interpreted to apply only to failing debtors—to acts which indicate bankruptcy, and not to cases where bankruptcy has actually occurred. It will be recollected that when, at the instance of a creditor, a proceeding in bankruptcy is commenced, in consequence of any one of the acts of bankruptcy specified in the bill, the debtor is allowed to controvert the actual fact of bankruptcy, and have it tried and decided in the mode provided for in the bill.

Now, it would be most strange if a constitutional power were granted to act upon the mere evidence—perhaps deceptive evidence—of bankruptcy, and were denied to act on the indisputable fact of bankruptcy itself, after it had confessedly occurred. Directly the reverse of the argument asserted would be much more plausible. The power deals with bankrupts. It is a power to establish uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcies. It might, therefore, be maintained, with some plausibility, that the fact of an actual bankruptcy must exist before the power attaches. But laws which provide for bankruptcies notoriously existing, and for those acts which are supposed to denote their existence, both proceed upon the idea of insolvency; and I entertain no doubt that the power in the Constitution delegates an authority to Congress to legislate for both classes.

These, Mr. President, are my sentiments upon the bill under consideration. It is a measure imploringly solicited by large portions of our countrymen, and the only measure of general relief which, in the present posture of parties and public affairs, can be passed by Congress. I have purposely abstained, on this occasion, from any inquiry into the causes which have produced or augmented the distress and bankruptcy which unhappily prevail; because I wished to excite no feelings, and to make no reproaches, which might have a tendency to endanger the bill. I have restricted myself to a consideration of the fact itself, of the numerous bankruptcies existing in the country. Nor has my desire for the success of the bill been less, because there are only some eight or ten States of the Union in which it is most needed. For it has ever been with me a motive, regulating my public conduct, to concur in the adoption of any constitutional measure demanded by the wants or necessities of any part of the Union, although it might not be requisite to the prosperity of the State whose servant I am. This motive acquires, in my opinion, irresistible force when we reflect that Congress alone can minister to the sufferings of the community by exercising this power exclusively confided to its authority.

The Declaration of American Independence, which announced our existence as a nation, solemnly proclaims, as a self evident truth, that the right of every individual person to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, is unalienable. Does the wretched bankrupt, sunk down and overwhelmed by perhaps unmerited misfortunes, against which no human foresight or prudence could guard, enjoy the benefit of this maxim? He is not, indeed, deprived of life; but he drags out a miserable and lingering existence, without one cheering hope. The humanity of progressive civilization has exempted his person from incarceration in the dark cells of a public jail; but the liberty which is granted to him enables him only to see more distinctly, in the light of heaven, and intensely to feel, the misery of his condition. Stripped of all motives to human exertion; with the incubus of an immovable mass of debt upon him; surrounded by a family sharing, without being able to alleviate, his sorrows and sufferings, he is mocked by the privilege of "the pursuit of happiness," pronounced to be unalienable in the most memorable declaration of human rights that was ever promulgated to the world. Let us, sir, make that guaranty substantial, practical, available, by fulfilling the duty imposed upon us in the power delegated in the Constitution to pass this law.

SPEECH OF MR. KNIGHT,

OF RHODE ISLAND,

In Senate, March 11, 1840—On the resolution to restore the duty on umbrellas and parasols.

Mr. PRESIDENT: I will ask leave to introduce the following resolution, and to make some preliminary remarks thereon:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of bringing in a bill declaring that the act of March 2, 1833, repealing the duty on 'bleached and unbleached linens, table linens, linen napkins, and linen cambrics, and worsted stuff goods, shawls, and other manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be the component material of chief value, coming from this side of the Cape of Good Hope, except sewing silk,' shall not be so construed as to include umbrellas and parasols."

Sir, in the tariff of 1832, umbrellas are distinctly named as subject to a duty of twenty-five per cent. ad valorem; they continued to pay the duty until the last year—nearly seven years—when a construction was put on the law of 1833, allowing the importation of umbrellas free of duty. Whether this is a judicial decision or a Treasury construction, I know not; but such is the fact, that they are now imported free of duty. It seems to me that the paragraph of the law repealing the duties, was intended to apply to piece goods only, and not to umbrellas and parasols, and in proposing to have the committee bring in a bill declaring that the paragraph of the law shall not be so construed as to include umbrellas and parasols, we have a precedent directly in point.

Sir, a few years past a memorial was presented to the Senate, stating that a similar construction had been put on the law admitting railroad iron free of duty. This was referred to the Committee on Manufactures. That committee reported a bill declaring that the act releasing from duty railroad iron, should not be so construed as to include spikes, pins, and chains, as railroad iron. The bill passed both Houses of Congress, and is now the law; and all that is required in this case is, to pass a similar act, and the manufacturers of umbrellas and parasols will be placed where they were under the tariff of 1832, and then they will be saved from ruin by the labor of foreign countries. This is all that is required, or is necessary to be done in this case.

Sir, I will now notice some of the remarks made by the Senator from South Carolina the other day, which appear to me to have a bearing on the resolution under consideration.

It was stated by that Senator "that every tariff for protection has invariably disappointed its friends in the protection anticipated, and has been followed by a demand for another tariff with increased duties, to afford a protection vainly anticipated from its predecessor."

In replying to this statement, I will endeavor to show that every tariff has disappointed its friends in the protection anticipated by them. My remarks are intended to apply to one of the great and leading manufactures of our country, (to wit, cotton,) and I shall leave to others to state the effect of the tariff on the manufacture of iron, lead, glass, wool, &c.

The tariff of 1816 was designed to protect and establish the manufactures of the country, without which the cotton manufacture would have languished, and soon would have died; but, by the timely interposition of Congress, it was saved from impending ruin. The tariff of 1816 secured the home market to the manufacturer for such goods as he was prepared to make at that time, and, in effect, prohibited the importation of the almost worthless cottons of Asia, and the coarse cottons of Great Britain, and, at the same time, imposed a duty of three cents per pound on all cotton imported into this country. This duty of three cents per pound excluded all cotton from use by our manufacturers, except that of the growth of the United States; and this was called the American system: to wit, to raise the cotton in the United States, to manufacture it here, and then wear it by our own citizens. This duty of three cents per pound compelled our manufacturers to use a better quality of cotton in their business, and consequently, a better quality of coarse fabrics was made by them than was made by the manufacturers of other countries; the manufacturers of other countries using the best cotton for their finer fabrics, and the poorest for their coarse goods. Having thus, by the tariff of 1816, firmly established the manufacture of coarse cottons, it consummated all that was expected by the practical manufacturers and the real friends of protection. In truth, the coarse fabrics were all that the country was prepared to make at that time. The tariff of 1816 might be said to be an experiment, and a most successful experiment it proved, both for manufacturer and producer of cotton, and, also, to the country. I know it is said, and believed by many, that a duty on cotton gives no protection to the cotton planter, that the price is regulated by the European market, and that a duty has no effect on it. Whatever effect it may have on the cotton planter, one thing, I believe, will not be denied, that a duty of three cents per pound prohibits a poorer quality of cotton being imported and manufactured in the country, and which, when manufactured, would appear as well to the eye as fabrics made of the cotton of the United States; but, when closely examined, it would be perceived that the thread is not as well formed and twisted, and consequently, will not endure as much service as similar goods in appearance, made of the better cotton of the United States. The same duty on the cotton of Texas operates as a preventive to its manufacture in this country. This, sir, is a digression from the subject; my intention was, to show that the tariff of 1816 did not disappoint its true friends—they realized all they expected by it. It gave to them encouragement and protection, and firmly established the manufacture of cotton in the United States.

Sir, by this protection, and by the increasing skill and industry of the manufacturers, and, above all, by the great and progressive improvements of the machinery and mechanic arts generally, they were confirmed in the belief that they could make a better and finer quality of cotton goods, if protection could be extended to such quality also.

By subsequent tariffs, that protection was given; and what has been the result? Sir, the industry and skill of our manufacturers have equalled for beauty, and surpassed in durability, many of the manufactures of the old world. Not only the plain goods, but the calicoes, chintz, and fancy goods, will compare with any in the market; and yet we are told the tariff disappointed its friends, and was followed by a demand for another tariff, to afford the protection vainly anticipated from its predecessor.

Sir, the tariff of 1816 did protect, as far as it was designed or expected to protect, the manufacturer in making coarse cottons; and subsequent tariffs gave protection to another quality of domestics not included in the first tariff. These tariffs partly secured the home market to the productions of the manufacturer. The manufacturers created a new market for the cotton planter, and gave employment to the mechanic arts, and encouraged the farmer by an increased consumption of his productions, both for manufacture and daily consumption. Under these tariffs the manufacturers continued their business, and did not ask or request further protection from Congress, to my knowledge. They were contented, and the country prospered. The cotton planter had a new market for about one-fourth part of his productions by the establishment of maanufactures; and all were contented, and would have continued so, had not other causes disturbed the harmony of society. Sir, I know of no demand for an increased tariff after 1823, notwithstanding the expansion of the currency.

It is also stated by the honorable Senator, "that every increase of duty, however high, requires periodically, after a short interval, an additional increase." This proposition, as a general rule, I think cannot be sustained; it will not hold good in regard to caps, hats, shoes, lead, bar iron, iron castings, and cannot hold good with any article the country is prepared to supply to the amount required for consumption. The Senator is under a mistake also in regard to the greatest expansion of the currency from 1830 to 1832 in the greatest manufacturing district. The table exhibited by him was not correct, and hence the error or mistake made by him. He stated that the currency in Rhode Island had increased, from 1830 to 1832, one hundred per cent. The official statements in my possession show only an increase of about thirty-three per cent. This shows the Senator to be mistaken in his premises, and consequently the assertion or conclusion that the greatest manufacturing district had the greatest expansion of currency is not sustained. I do not consider this of much importance, further than to show that the fact relied on by the Senator in support of his argument does not exist, and, consequently, the argument drawn from it is without foundation, and therefore fails.

The theory of the Senator, that "the increase of protective duties is necessarily followed by an undue expansion of the currency until the price of production shall be equal to the protection," does not comport with our experience, or the history of the times. The facts are opposed to the principle assumed. The domestic goods protected by the tariff have not risen to the amount of the duty, and I call on that Senator to show, not only generally, but a single article manufactured of cotton in this country that has advanced in price under the protective duties, notwithstanding the expansion of the currency; and if it cannot be shown the the price has increased, but, on the contrary, that cotton goods have fallen in price, the theory of the Senator totally fails.

Take the whole range of cotton goods, look at the prices of shirting, sheeting, bedtick, chintz, calico, and fancy articles, which, before the protective duties were established, sold for 20, 30, 40, and 60 cents per yard, now selling at 8, 10, 15, and 20, and 25 cents per yard, and some white goods at 5 and 6 cents the yard, being a reduction in price of 100 per cent. and upwards. Is it not so with manufactures of iron and of leather? Nails have fallen in price one hundred per cent. and shoes and boots from ten to fifty per cent. Does this seem like protection being followed by an expansion of the currency till the increased price of production in consequence shall equal the increase of duty? Sir, the theory is well on paper, but when reduced to practice the rule does not hold good; competition deranges the theory, and the rule fails. Whenever the supply equals the demand of any article, that article will come down to the lowest price or cost of production.

The Senator says that the tariff of 1823 caused an influx of the precious metals into the country. I will admit, as a general rule, that, by the aid of a tariff giving employment to our own citizens, gold and silver are brought into the country. Is that a very great evil? They will go out again when needed and are of greater value in another country than in this. The legitimate use of specie is to settle accounts with nations as well as individuals, and it is constantly performing that office; and whenever there is a balance in our favor, the specie will flow towards this country; and when the balance is the other way, there will be an efflux of the precious metals.

The Senator states that the importation of gold and silver, over and above the exports, in the year 1829, was $3,092,478; and in the year 1830, $6,914,342; making in the two years an excess of imports of $10,006,820—and that the estimated amount of specie in the country on the first day of January, 1830, (including the importation of the year 1829,) was but twenty-five millions of dollars; a sum, in my opinion, a great deal too small for the wants and business of the country; and, under such circumstances, a consequent influx of specie must ensue. We had not our proportion of the precious metals, and the importation of specie placed us nearer to an equality with other nations. And if the tariff of 1828 was the instrument that produced the result, it deserves universal approbation. I would hold to a tariff for that very reason, under the hope that whenever such circumstances shall again occur, it would again perform the same service.

Again, the Senator says, reduce duties, and export more. Sir, I am not opposed to exporting all the productions we have to part with, and all that it is in our power to produce; but, if we reduce duties to a low rate, will not importations greatly increase? Is it desirable to increase imports and involve the country still further in debt to Europe? If we allow foreigners to send their productions here free of duty, do we not assist foreign labor and depress our own? And will not such a policy break up our manufactures? The home market of the foreign producer is secured to him by his Government. We are not permitted to enter his domicil on equal terms with him, and why should we surrender our market to him free of duty also?

The foreign manufacturer, after supplying his home market, will send his surplus productions to us free of duty, and by such a process we have neither a home nor foreign market, and the consequence will be prosperity to the foreigner, and ruin to ourselves; and, to carry out the system, the result will be to carry all our machinery to Europe. If the identical machinery is not exported, new machinery will be put in operation there, to supply the deficiency created by the destruction of our own by such a policy. And would such a proceeding benefit the people of the United States? It would be ruin and death to the manufacturers, and, in my estimation, a deep and an abiding injury to every other interest in this Union. Under such a policy, would the cotton planter have a better market, or would it add to the number of consumers of his productions, or to their ability to consume? The North, under such a system, would not be able to purchase, and therefore could not consume; they must live on the productions of their sterile soil and cold climate, without many of the comforts and luxuries of the present day, if luxuries they may be called. No, sir; by the destruction of our manufactures the cotton planter would be deprived of one of his best markets: not the largest, but the best. The home market destroyed, nearly all his productions will be thrown into one of the markets of Europe; and then who would control the price, the seller or the purchaser? Sir, Great Britain, by securing the home market (including her colonies and dependencies) to her manufacturers, gives to them the power of competition all over the world; a competition they could not sustain without the home market. The profits on the goods consumed by her own subjects will pay for most of the labor, the raw material, and the expense of manufacturing; and the surplus, after supplying the home consumption, may be considered as mostly profit to the manufacturer. This surplus he sends to a foreign market, and, if he sells at a high price, the greater his profit; if at a low price, it takes nothing from his capital, but only diminishes his income for that year; and in this way the British manufacturer, by his surplus productions alone, can break down all competition of manufacturers whose home market is not protected in some degree by a tariff; and when competition is broken down, he will command his own price, and the consumer will have to pay it. No, sir, I would not repeal all duties, but would sustain a tariff equal to our great competitor and adversary at least. I am in favor of the old American system, which commenced with the war of the Revolution, and has continued to the present time, and so eloquently advocated by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] the other day, when he so clearly established the great principle, without contradiction from any quarter, that it is easier and better for the country to pay ten millions of dollars per annum to our own citizens, than to pay the same sum to foreigners. This, sir, is the whole essence of the American system, and this is the system I desire to maintain; and whoever supports the principle laid down by the Senator from Tennessee gives energy and effect to the American system.

Suppose, Mr. President, that we repeal all duties on foreign importations, and admit goods free of duty, and drive our manufacturers to a foreign market with their productions, what shall we gain by the change? If our productions are not consumed here, but exported, we must import as many more for our consumption as we export. Nothing will be gained to the country by such a change, but loss on freight and other expenses. We may add to the table of imports and exports on paper, but in table of loss and gain we shall be on the wrong side; and this is the result of importing more in order to export.

Sir, we need not be alarmed about exports so long as imports exceed the value of our exports as they now do. We have imported from Great Britain and her dependencies alone, in the last twenty years, nearly seventy millions of dollars more than we have exported to her in the same time, including all the great staples of the country. No, sir, we need not fear, as the following table will show:

NOTE.—Whoever will take the trouble to examine the foregoing table of imports and exports, will perceive in what regular succession the embarrassments in our monetary concerns have succeeded the over importations of foreign productions. The importations of foreign productions in the years 1835, 1836, and 1837, amount to the enormous sum of $480,855,954, and the exports of domestic productions for the same years to $303 670,176, leaving a balance against the United States of $177,185,778. The export of foreign articles at the same time was $61,105,817, leaving a deficit to be paid in cash or otherwise by the United States of one hundred and thirteen millions seventy-nine thousand nine hundred and sixty one dollars, clearly showing, "beyond all doubt or cavil," that here lies one great cause of our distress; and whatever restrains these excessive importations, whether it be a tariff or other cause, will give relief to our citizens. Let the watchword be, produce more and import less, and restore to the country a sound and well regulated currency, and most of our embarrassments will be removed.

Sir, the excessive importations of preceding years, and especially those of 1835, 1836, and 1837, together with a certain Treasury order, ruined many, and compelled the banks to suspend specie payments, and inflicted great injury on the people; but this was trifling and insignificant, when compared with the loss that must ensue by breaking up the manufactures of the country. But, sir, I cannot believe that it is the desire or wish of the Senator to destroy the manufacturers of the country; he only misconceives their ability. He says to them, you must make bricks, without fuel to burn them. This they cannot do, any more than an individual can run with his legs tied; and to require our manufacturers to compete with the world in foreign markets without securing to them some portion of the home market, is requiring more than they can do; they must fail under such a system of government.

Mr. President, it is also said that the protective system is a war upon exports! Does the protective policy of other nations lessen their exports? I will admit that if four hundred thousand bales of cotton are manufactured and consumed in the United States, then there is so much the less to export; and if five millions of dollars worth of pork and beef and breadstuffs are consumed by the mechanics and manufacturers, then there is the less to export; and if this is a war on exports, be it so; it is a war the country can endure, without growing poorer by the operation. But, sir, is the amount of exports the only indication of the prosperity of the country? The protection of the manufacture of bar iron and lead by the tariff has not much increased exports; but their consumption has increased at home, and labor has received its reward. The protective duties on lead have prevented its importation, and increased the manufacture of paint or white lead to a great extent, from the home material, and for home consumption, but not for exportation; still the country is not the less flourishing, or labor in less demand on that account.

Sir, it is stated by the Senator that, in 1838, the largest quantity of domestic manufactures were exported, and he attributes the cause to the reduction of the tariff, and therefore concludes that a further reduction of the tariff will add to the prosperity of the country. I cannot believe for a moment that the trifling reduction of the tariff on cotton manufactures was the sole cause of these exportations, nor do I agree that a great reduction of the tariff will make us more prosperous or happy; there were over importations in 1836 and '37, but these over-importations may be attributed to other causes than the tariff, not now necessary to discuss.

Sir, the increased exportation of domestic manufactures may be attributed, in some degree, to the over importations of the two preceding years of linens, silks, and worsted stuff goods, which, added to the large amount of domestic manufactures on hand, completely overstocked the market: there were more of this description of goods in the country than were needed for immediate consumption, and, of course, but very slow sales could be made at even reduced prices. The manufacturers with us had pile upon pile of their own goods on hand: they did not estimate the amount by the piece, bale, or box, but by the cord. This great accumulation of domestic goods, and the market being also glutted with foreign productions, and consequent slow sales, crowded the manufacturers for money to pay their current expenses, and finally compelled many of them to sell for as much as they could get; and cotton fabrics were shipped out of the country to a larger amount than on any former occasion. And, I understand, the present year, from similar causes, large shipments have been made to China, but I possess no official information of the fact. But the Senator insists that the increased exportation of all our productions for a series of years, from 1831 to 1838, was also in consequence of the reduction of the tariff; if this is so, then the increase of exportation would have been pari passu with that reduction. How are the facts? In 1837 and '38 the exportations were less than the two preceding years by about sixteen millions of dollars, when, according to the principle, there should have been an increase of about the same sum; making a vibration from the rule of about thirty millions of dollars. This fact, alone, it seems to me, destroys the theory of the Senator; if his proposition is correct, there would have been a regular increase of exportation in proportion to the reduction of duties.

Sir, in my mind it was not this reduction of the tariff that gave the impetus to the exportation of the great staples of the country. The increase commenced as early as 1830, and continued to increase until 1836; in 1837 they decreased about eleven millions of dollars, as the tables show. But, sir, the true cause, as I conceive, may be found in the increased production of cotton by an increased quantity of land brought into cultivation in the cotton growing States.

Now, sir, it we can ascertain the number of bales of cotton produced each year and exported, and the price, we may find the solution to the cause of the increase of domestic exports without the aid of the tariff. It is apparent to my mind that the more we produce the more we have to part with, and that which is not needed for home consumption will be exported, and that the amount of exports depends more on the seasons and on our own industry than on the tariff. But, after all, it must be admitted that the home market is the best market for any country, and the greater the variety of productions the better for the people. I admit our home market is not sufficient to consume the agricultural productions of the country, but the home market will be increased by the permanent establishment of manufactures, by taking from agriculture a portion of its labor, and by increasing their ability to consume, for the amount of consumption depends much on the ability to consume as well as on numbers.

Sir, we protect the farmer and planter in all their productions, and why should we refuse protection to the manufacturer? It is the labor in both cases which is protected, and I see no reason why one branch of industry and labor should not be protected as well as another, provided the labor and industry be equally beneficial to the country. The proposition of the Senator to reduce duties and export more, if adopted, will not add to the wealth or happiness of the people, but in peace will give to the foreigner an advantage over our own citizens, and in war would be most disastrous to us.

Mr. President, I will notice one more statement of the honorable Senator, which I conceive to be founded in mistake, and extremely mischievous in its consequences. The Senator says that this increase of the exportation of domestic manufactures was "in the midst of all the embarrassments of commerce, and expansion and derangement of the currency, and, let me add, what has been so much dreaded by the friends of manufactures, the mighty increase of the exports of our great agricultural staples during the same period." I confess my surprise at the statement that the friends of manufactures dreaded an increase of the exportation of flour, rice, cotton, and tobacco! Sir, I live among many of the friends of manufactures, and the statement is as new to me as it will be to them when they shall read the speech of the honorable Senator. Why should we dread the increase of these exportations? The imports now are far above the exports, and an increase of exports will prevent a disturbance of the monetary concerns of the country, which is always disastrous to the manufacturer. He requires a steady and firm state of money and of business, and the less the fluctuations in prices or the currency the better for those concerned in manufactures. It is not a high price, and then a low price, that is beneficial to them, but a steady and reasonable price that makes them prosper in their business.

Sir, we have no reason or cause to dread the prosperity of the South, and I sincerely regret to see such an expression widely circulated in the South to excite the prejudices of the people in that section against the people of the North. Heretofore, in times of good feeling which existed between us, there was great reciprocity of trade and commerce between the North and the South. We are great consumers of their productions, and they, to a considerable amount, of our manufactures; and the greater their prosperity the more they will consume, and the greater the trade and intercourse the greater the friendship and regard we have for each other. And were it not for other causes than those of trade, commerce, and social intercourse, we should be more united and a happier people. It is to be regretted that such an expression should have come from such a quarter. I can assure the Senator that, so far as I know, there is not a single individual that dreads or would impede the prosperity and happiness of the South; if large exports of their productions will give that happiness and prosperity, we say God speed; we do not object, but we will do all in our power, both as consumers and navigators, to assist in producing the consummation so devoutly wished. That we are doing so at the present time, the following statement of the imports and consumption of the productions of the South and of the grain-growing States into the town of Providence will bear ample testimony. Providence is but one of the ports of entry in the State of Rhode Island; there are two other collection districts from which I have no data to make a statement of the importations into those districts, but they must considerably increase the amount.

1838.	Domestic Imports.	1839.
Bales of cotton,	55,804	Bales of cotton, 43,367
Barrels of flour,	73,125	Barrels of flour, 81,115
Bushels of grain,	538,721	Bushels of grain, 720,550
Tons of coal,	28,583	Tons of coal, 39,170
	Average for the last seven years.
Cotton bales,	47,720	Bushels of grain, 479,724
Barrels of flour,	84,835

By this statement it will be perceived that we in Rhode Island are giving our mite to the prosperity of our sister States, and if they will reciprocate favors with us, we will not only be a prosperous community, but a happy and united people.

[Mr. CALHOUN said that he did not recollect using the term attributed to him; if he did, it was not his intention to use it in any offensive sense; the term might be stronger than he supposed at the time, but he had no intention of uttering any reflection toward the manufacturers; he was their friend.]

In reply to Mr. CALHOUN, who contended that manufactures were established in the country as early as 1805, Mr. KNIGHT said he did not deny the existence of manufactures previous to 1816; and if the honorable Senator, who seems to remember every thing, would cast his memory back previous to that time, he will recollect non-intercourse, non-importation acts, and finally war, which gave the impetus and protection to manufactures; and when peace came, these were all swept out of existence, and the manufactures were then prostrate, and could not have survived without the tariff of 1816—they could not have operated a single year without utter ruin to themselves. Sir, the tariff of 1816 did firmly establish the manufacture of cotton in the country; and it would not have been established at that time without it. As to some of the other statements of the Senator, and about which we differ, Mr. K. said the difference might be attributed to the fact that the Senator deals in theories, and that he himself was a practical man. Theory and practice do not always come to the same result. I agree that expansion of currency and high duties will increase prices, were it not for competition; but when skill, labor, and competition supply the demand, the price does not materially increase, and then his theory fails. Competition breaks down theories—a tariff creates competition, and competition supplies the demand for consumption at the lowest price.

SPEECH OF MR. NISBET,

OF GEORGIA,

In the House of Representatives, March 24, 1840—On the Treasury Note bill.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill authorizing a further issue of Treasury Notes, Mr. NISBET spoke as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am fortunate in this, that I have no past deeds to be raised up in judgment against me as a member of Congress. I have been here but a little while. My name has not been upon your journals until this session. I am "novus homo," a new man in the councils of the nation. There are no inconsistent votes to be aroused from their slumber, and arrayed for my condemnation. I am not to be caught, as many are, upon the yeas and nays of former times. And for the same reason, with other reasons, I have no one to catch—no one to impale—no political tergiversations to expose. I congratulate myself that I am under no necessity of self defence, and feel neither the obligation nor the desire to assail others. I shall not, therefore, in these most unprofitable, tedious talks so common in this House, occupy the time of the committee.

The debate on the bill now under discussion has been exceedingly discursive, embracing almost every topic connected with the financial wants of the country, and the administration of the General Government. The Bank, the Sub-Treasury, the distresses of the country, the state of the Treasury, the errors and the follies and the virtues of Mr. Van Buren, have afforded themes of vast enlargement and great eloquence for honorable gentlemen. It is the custom of the age, and of this country particularly, to discuss, upon every question, every thing; to run the round entire of all the subjects about which the people do or may be presumed to feel any interest. And that subject, too, which is most likely to be slighted by the orator is the subject which is before him for discussion. I do not claim exemption for myself in this particular. I, like others, have been given to wandering and tedious prolixity. So far as concerns myself, I shall speedily amend, if possible; and, so far as it concerns others, I am well convinced that, in the custom referred to, there is neither utility nor good taste, and that it is more honored in the breach than in the observance.

In relation to a National Bank, I will only remark that I have always believed it to be unconstitutional in any and all its forms. So believing, it is neither necessary nor expedient to inquire into its utility, its blessings, or its curses. This objection to it stands at the threshold, and, amounting to a prohibition of a power to charter a Bank to Congress, is a conclusive answer to all arguments drawn from the expediency of such an institution. I hold that such a power cannot be claimed for Congress but by a latitudinary rule of construing the Constitution; such a rule as was of old established by the greatest Bank champion known to our annals. I mean, sir, Alexander Hamilton. This rule, in the operation of our system, will clothe Congress with almost any power which the varying exigencies of the future may seem to make either necessary or desirable. The reversed rule, I am daily more convinced, can alone maintain the just rights of the States, and restrain the ever-forward advance of Federal encroachment.

I admit, Mr. Chairman, the truthfulness of the picture of distress which the country now exhibits, drawn with such graphic accuracy by my friend, the eloquent member from South Carolina, (Mr. THOMPSON.) I know that all orders of men and all species of industry are labering under a pecuniary pressure of unexampled severity; and no part of the Union feels it more sensibly than that from which you and I came. Desolation sits upon the face of this great Union, paralyzing its energies and smothering its resources. To inquire into the causes of all this would require such time as this committee would not grant. These causes are manifold, and, among them, it has been stated, are the issues by the Government of Treasury notes. So far as the debt incurred by the Government by these issues is concerned, I admit, to that extent, the Government has increased its liabilities, but not the taxes or the liabilities of the people. For all these issues, past and prospective, have been, and will be, but anticipations of the revenue of the Government, accruing in the ordinary way and from the ordinary sources: for they have been, and those to be issued by this bill are to be, redeemed at short and specified periods from the resources of the Treasury. As a proof of this, of all the previous issues of Treasury notes there remains out now and redeemable only a little more than two millions of dollars. I like to view things sinely. Let others connect this bill as they may with other things; I am unable to see in it any necessary connection with the past or present distress of the country. It is not, as I suppose, designed to afford relief to the country, much less to oppress it. It is a measure of temporary relief to the Government from a pecuniary pressure, from which it must be relieved, or submit to dishonor before the world. I submit, then, sir, if it is a fair course of argument to involve this measure in the labyrinth of disordered currency, exchanges, private and public suffering. It would seem more statesmanlike to meet it upon its independent merits.

It was argued the other day, by my friend and colleague, (Mr. KING) that this bill is part and parcel of the Sub-Treasury scheme, and, being opposed to that, he thereby fortified his opposition to both measures. I listened with delight to that gentleman's speech, and give to it that respect which his own excellent mind and character and long personal friendship for him demand of me. If I thought with him, I would be happy to vote with him; and that his own convictions are satisfactory to him, and wholly sincere, there can be no doubt. But is this bill part of the Sub-Treasury scheme? Is it an adjunct to it? And is it true that this Government really designs to collect the revenues of the country in specie, and hoarding that (in prospective amount absolutely incalculable) to issue paper—Treasury notes or any other paper—in discharge of its own liabilities? Is it true that the Russian system of finance is here to be adopted? Will the Government establish a bank upon the specie revenue as a basis, filling out all the channels of circulation, controlling the currency, regulating the exchanges, and absorbing in her Sub-Treasury vaults the specie of the four quarters of the world? The proposition is a strong one, alarming even to fancy; such a one as this Government cannot venture upon without involving us at once in revolution. My colleague fears such things are contemplated, and will be the necessary result of the Sub-Treasury bill and its kindred and auxiliary measure, the bill I am now discussing. Perhaps I should rather say, he fears that, in times to come, such may be the result of that system, if persevered in, which is now beginning. It may be so. His forebodings may be realized; his prophecies may be fulfilled. One thing I do verily believe, and it is this: that, should this Administration or any other come into this hall and ask for Treasury notes, with a redundant Treasury of specie, or of any other available funds, such request would be the signal of its overthrow. And I would be among the first of those who would like to be in at the death. This bill, in its terms, in its origin, and the manner of its execution, has, to my mind, no connection with the Sub-Treasury bill. That has not yet come before us. This is now upon its passage. That provides for the collection, disbursement, and custody of the public revenue, and prescribes the kind of money in which it shall be paid. This bill, not trenching upon, or being connected with, those objects, only authorizes, by issue of Treasury notes, the loan of five millions of dollars. This is not the time for discussing the Sub Treasury. When that bill is before us, then it will be fair to consider whether the constant issue of Government credits be part of the scheme. If it be, then I shall be with my honorable friend in opposition to it.

But now, instead of a full Treasury as a basis for credits, I find it empty. Its utter vacuity is the very cause, front, and head of this offending bill—no more. Viewing, therefore, the question as the facts present it, I cannot give such weight to the member's arguments as to justify my voting with him.

Mr. Chairman, in advocating the issue of Treasury notes, I am not to be considered as the apologist or supporter of the Administration. I am neither the one nor the other; nor do I appear on this occasion its assailant. I leave these tasks to those, of which there are not a few, who have for them a special vocation. The errors of those who administer the Government ought to be exposed, and a corrupt Administration ought to be unseated; so it is but right that they should have defence. Of this sort of warfare, there is quite enough in this hall. I do not complain of this; but I do desire not to be understood as supporting or opposing a measure because proposed by one or the other of the great parties.

I was elected by a political party in opposition to the Administration. I am myself in the Opposition. The obligations I owe to my constituents, as well as my own convictions of duty to the country, place me in the Opposition. There I expect to remain. But, sir, the opposition of the State Rights party of Georgia and of myself, by them elected, is not capricious, but founded on principle; and whenever the measures of the Administration are in accordance with those principles by which that great and honest party regulate their political conduct, the opposition ceases. Is this, sir, a sufficient definition of a position? It is certainly explicit. To use the quaint language of a Southern editor, is this "the indefinite definition of the juttings and boundings of one's political nothing"—that is, one's position? These definitions are often necessary in this day, for a political position is an exceedingly variable thing. Politicians do not often stand long enough in the same place to create a position. They (positions) are intangible, optical illusions, which cheat the sight. They remind me of an angle of the river Potomac, called Point-no-point, which seems to be, but vanishes as you approach it, existing only in the illusion created by light and shade.

The name of Mr. Crawford has been quoted against this bill. This is a name, sir, which I delight to honor. I revere the memory of that transcendently great man—great in mind and in integrity. "Magnum vir et venerabile nomen." I thank the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] for the deserved tribute which he was pleased to bestow upon Mr. Crawford. It is even true, as he said, that take him all in all, he has had no superior since Washington died. He was a just exponent of State Rights principles—steady, practical, and sound. His policy was to hold the Government strictly to its conceded powers, whilst he frittered not away the doctrines he professed by unmeaning abstractions and metaphysical refinements, calculated only to bring them into contempt and ridicule. But the authority of Mr. Crawford is only to the expediency of this mode of raising money. He did not raise to it any constitutional objection; and this is the objection upon which resistance to it is now predicated. He believed the power liable to abuse, being easy of exercise, seductive, and therefore most likely to be resorted to. But when the circumstances of the Government and country are such as we know do now exist, it is by no means certain that Mr. Crawford himself, if living, would not yield to the guarded and moderate use of the power. The constitutional power in his day, as I believe, was not questioned. This is an objection of recent origin, and started first, I believe, by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] at the extra session of 1837. For myself, I would certainly exercise the power most sparingly, and only in cases of pressing, nay, controlless necessity. Of this necessity Congress must judge. It is no part of my duty on the present occasion to prove that this power may not be abused. I know it may. But having satisfied myself that there is no valid constitutional objection, it behooves me only to establish that position, and that the present exigency justifies the use of the power. If, in some coming day, it should be abused, why, let the blame of that abuse rest upon those who perpetrate it.

In relation, then, to the expediency of the use of the power now, I remark that all parties admit that the Treasury needs money, and must have it at once, or be dishonored. It is also conceded that these notes will at once subserve the purpose of relief; that funds, through their agency, can be had, without delay, and with certainty, or that they will themselves subserve the uses of money, being made receivable in Government dues. By a few days' delay, we are told, and no one has questioned the statement, the Treasury will be exhausted, and the Government and the nation will be dishonored. I cannot see the national credit prostrated, or in danger of it, without coming to the rescue. The distress of the country has fallen also upon the Government. It is upon the verge of bankruptcy. It has even been stated in debate, with what truth I do not know, that the bills of the Department are even now under protest. Now, sir, the Government is the representative of the honor of sixteen millions of people, and of the dignity of twenty-six sovereign States. It is no small matter to have this honor sullied and this dignity impaired.

I will not stop to inquire what improvidence, what want of forecast, what false theory, or error of practice has brought all this about. The inquiry, though, sir, ought, at a suitable time, and I trust will be made. I will not stay to ask the reason of this state of things, but, with filial alacrity, hasten to the relief of the great head of the States. I therefore conclude that cause enough now exists even for the use of a power which is liable to abuse. The only objection which I have to my colleague's [Mr. KING] amendment is, that the relief it will afford cannot be so immediate, or so certain, and that a loan upon his plan would be for a longer time than I should like to see the credit of the Government extended. I must confess, too, Mr. Chairman, that, having satisfied myself that the Government can borrow money through the agency of such notes as this bill proposes to issue, constitutionally, I am willing to assert for the Government that power. Because, sir, believing, as I do, that it has no power to incorporate a bank, and seeing no prospect, even if it were desirable, so to amend the Constitution as to confer it, I know of no means left to the Government, in times of war, to raise money, but through this very agency. I have looked into this question, sir, with more interest than that which grows out of the present. The destinies of the future are involved in it.

I would greatly prefer, instead of voting supplies in this or any other form, to retrench and cut down the expenditures with the receipts of revenue accruing from the ordinary sources, and will go with any party in arresting those enormous appropriations which require high duties, and those high tariffs which in turn justify large appropriations. Tariffs and expenditures reproduce each other. High tariffs and vast disbursements constitute the leading policy of many of those gentlemen who have such troublesome qualms about the constitutionality of this bill. Some efforts at retrenchment have been made during this session, but so feeble and ill directed as to amount to nothing. Gentlemen have reduced the salary of one officer five hundred dollars; a reduction against which I voted, because I believe that fair salaries make good officers.

The game was not worth the chase. This was running down hares when lions and tigers were in the jungle. If gentlemen will refuse appropriations for the Cumberland road, for harbors, rivers, and canals, I will gladly go with them. But the necessity and principle of retrenchment do not require the rejection of this bill, for this reason, that the money now sought to be raised is to discharge existing obligations, from which there is no escape. Retrenchment must be prospective.

I understood the gentleman from New York, (Mr. VANDERPOEL,) who advocated this bill, to deny that it was a loan, and to deny that it created a debt. Not only did he deny that these notes, when issued, would create a debt, but rebuked my colleague for, as he charged by his amendment, creating a national debt. This is strange disingenuousness, or a want of correct understanding of the subject. My colleague's proposition is for a direct loan; this also is a loan, and if not a loan, then, as I believe, wholly unconstitutional. Both are debts. The moment these notes are issued, the obligation to redeem them is perfect; and is not that debt? It matters not how they are redeemable, whether in specie or by receipt into the Treasury as money; they are still the evidence of indebtedness. It seems to me that when that gentleman denied that the issue of Treasury notes was a loan, he abandoned the only ground upon upon which it can be justified.

And now, sir, having removed from around this bill the rubbish which almost hid it from view, and brought it out to fair inspection, I will address myself to the inquiry into its constitutionality. In this inquiry the guides I propose to myself are the canons of State Rights politics. I belong to that school. I hold to those principles which are repudiated by the greater part of American politicians; which are not understood by some, and sneered at by many—principles which have been brought into disrepute more by the inconsistent practice of those who profess them than by any other cause. At the basis of that system of politics is the truth so plainly expressed in the Constitution, viz: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The United States can exercise no powers that are not delegated. All other powers, unless prohibited to the States, belong to them respectively, or to the people. When seeking for a power, therefore, it is indispensable to find the express grant. It would scarcely be necessary for me to say that all power "necessary and proper" to carry into effect a delegated power is with that power also given. It is not enough for him who claims the power to show that it is not prohibited; for, by the clause which I have quoted, all undelegated power, except such as is prohibited, belongs to the States or the people. Now, there are powers which belong neither to the States nor to the Government, and they are such as are not delegated to the latter, and are prohibited to the former. They lie in abeyance, dormant, in the sovereign mass, the people of the States respectively. Among these is the power to "emit bills of credit." I assume at once, or, rather concede, that Congress has no power to emit bills of credit. I contend that the power to issue Treasury notes is embraced in the delegated power "to borrow money on the credit of the United States. To establish this position, it will be necessary to show that the notes proposed to be issued are not bills of credit; if they are not, then they are but the evidences of a debt, and the operation is a loan.

My colleague, [Mr. KING,] and all who have followed him, have sought to establish the unconstitutionality of Treasury notes, upon the authority of the Madison Papers, recently published, and he has invoked to his aid the name of that truly great and virtuous man, (Mr. Madison.) Mr. Chairman, no authority was necessary to prove that Congress has not the power to "emit bills of credit," because such a power is not among those that are delegated. And I shall show, I trust, that the Madison Papers prove nothing more than that a power to "emit bills on the credit of the United States," was, in the Convention which adopted the Federal Constitution, proposed and rejected. See 3d volume Madison Papers, page 1343. The gentlemen, some of them, however, contend that this authority not only denies to Congress the power to emit bills of credit, but also the power to use its credit by issuing notes, and such notes as those contemplated in the bill; in other words, that Congress cannot, upon this plan, borrow money.

Now, sir, I think it is manifest that the Convention intended no such thing. What was the power sought to be conferred by those who were for this amendment, and to be denied by those who were against it? It was obviously a power to make and circulate paper money, and that, and that only, is meant by "bills of credit." The evil dreaded was a continuous power of issuing bills upon the credit of the United States, with a view to circulation, and to answer the purposes of currency. This is proven by the language and arguments used by the members of the Convention at the time. Mr. Madison, who seems, at first, to have been disinclined to strike out, said: "Will it not be sufficient to prohibit making them [bills] a tender?"—looking plainly to a money-creating power.

Mr. Mason said, "Though he had a mortal hatred to paper money, yet, as he could not foresee all emergencies, he was unwilling to tie the hands of the Legislature." Mr. Gorham said, "The power, as far as it will be necessary or safe, is involved in that of borrowing." Mr. Gorham voted for striking out, and his authority is directly in support of the position which I assume, to wit, that the power of issuing notes is involved in that of borrowing. Gouverneur Morris remarked, "Striking out the words will leave room still for notes of a responsible minister, which will do all the good without the mischief. The moneyed interest will oppose the plan of Government, if paper emissions be not prohibited." The authority of this eminent financier proves two things, viz: that paper emissions was the evil guarded against; and that if the words "and emit bills," &c. were stricken out, still there was room for the notes of the money officer of the Government. Mr. Mercer "was a friend to paper money; he was consequently opposed to a prohibition of it altogether." Mr. Ellsworth "thought this a favorable opportunity to shut and bar the door against paper money." Mr. Randolph, notwithstanding his antipathy to paper money, could not agree to strike out, &c. Thus you see, Mr. Chairman, that the members of the Convention understood "bills of credit" to mean paper money, and that the power denied was a power to emit paper money.

There is a note to the Madison Papers made, as stated by the member from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] by the gentleman who superintended their publication, upon the authority of a manuscript of Mr. Madison himself, in these words, viz: "This vote in the affirmative of Virginia was occasioned by the acquiescence of Mr. Madison, who became satisfied that striking out the words would not disable the Government from the use of public notes, as far as they could be safe and proper, and would only cut off the pretext for a paper currency, and particularly for making the bills a tender either for public or private debts." I claim, therefore, the name of Mr. Madison as authority for all I have yet assumed in this argument, and will only add that Treasury notes during the last war, under his administration, were issued to a large amount, without being by him, so far as I know or believe, questioned.

It is assumed, however, that these notes are bills of credit, or paper money in that sense in which those who framed the Constitution understood those terms. If this assumption be correct, then the argument is at an end; for, in that event, I am very clear there is no power in Congress to pass this law. If it be incorrect, the argument also terminates; for, in that event, there remains, as I have shown, no further objection to the exercise of the power. This, therefore, is the only issue remaining for elucidation. The phrase "bills of credit" admits of a variety of meanings. It has a meaning peculiar to commercial men, and may signify all negotiable paper payable at a future day. So it may mean, in one sense, any evidence of a debt due by the Government and redeemable at a future day; but, as used in the Constitution, it has a monetary meaning different from both of these. It is obviously designed to express money, as used generally, and intended for circulation in paper form.

I take it for granted that the power, which we admit is not given the Government to emit bills of credit, is the same with that in those words prohibited to the States. Now, as to what is a bill of credit when issued by a State, we have the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Craig et al. vs. the State of Missouri. The Court, in this case, holds the following language:

"The word emit is never employed in describing those contracts by which a State binds itself to pay money at a future day for services actually received, or for money loaned for present use; nor are instruments executed for such purpose, in common language, denominated bills of credit. To emit bills of credit conveys to the mind the idea of issuing paper intended to circulate through the community for its ordinary purposes as money." See 4 Peters's Reports, 431.

Now, sir, let us see what are the Treasury notes to be issued by this bill—what are their distinguishing characteristics, and determine whether, according to the opinion of the Supreme Court, they are or not "bills of credit." Let us see whether "they are paper intended to circulate through the community for its ordinary purpose as money." And let us see, also, whether they are not the mere evidences of a debt—instruments executed as evidence of a contract for money loaned for present use. The bill before the committee receives the act of 1837, and to that we refer for the character of the notes.

Now, sir, I contend that they are not intended to circulate as money, first, because they are not, as bills are, redeemable on demand, nor can they circulate beyond the limited period of time; and an indefinite period of circulation is one of the distinguishing features of money; that is, it may, and it is generally desired that it shall circulate for an unlimited period. Now, these notes are redeemable at the time fixed in the act by virtue of which they are issued. It is provided in the second section of the act of 1837, that the said Treasury notes authorized to be issued by the first section of this act shall be reimbursed and redeemed by the United States at the Treasury thereof after the expiration of one year from the dates of said notes, respectively. It was urged by my colleague that the amount remaining out at the end of one year, the time at which the present bill expires by its own limitation, would remain out, and go fully into the circulation. The answer to this is, that, if they are not presented for redemption, upon notice from the Secretary of the Treasury to that effect, they no longer bear interest, and would, therefore, be subjected to at least a depreciation to the amount of interest they bear. This would doubtless send them home for redemption, and would operate as a preventive to their circulation.

Secondly. Because they bear interest. Interest is not a characteristic feature of bills designed to circulate. Bills of credit or paper money are intended to realize for the State or company issuing them a profit by reason of the fact that they do not bear interest, whilst those who use them, the community at large, pay interest for that use. But this bill charges the Government with interest upon the notes she may issue, thus placing her in the position of a borrower at an established rate of interest. Is not this, Mr. Chairman, the truth of the case? Is not the Government a borrower by placing her notes in the market to be vended for their principal with interest? Is this any thing more than borrowing money by the use of her credit, and are these bills any thing more than the written undertaking of the Government to refund at a time certain the money raised by their instrumentality?

Say that these notes are paid out in discharge of existing obligations, still it does not vary the case, for, in that event, it is but an extension of the credit of the Government for a benefit already realized, or money heretofore received. The process proposed in the bill is analogous to that known to every shopkeeper, by which money is borrowed from banks or capitalists upon accommodation paper. It is not less a loan because the note which attests the obligation of the borrower to pay may be negotiable; nor is it the less a loan because it realizes the receipt of no new fund, but continues the use of a fund already received. Are such notes, when issued by individuals, money in any fair sense of that word? If they are not then are not these notes money?

The fact that these notes do bear interest not only proves that they are not designed to circulate, but also restrains their circulation, for the reason that, if they bear an interest equal to the value of money, they will be taken and held by banks or capitalists upon permanent investment. To make them bear interest beyond all question, I propose, Mr. Chairman, before I take my seat, to offer an amendment, by way of proviso, to the last section of the bill, which is in these words:

"Provided, That the notes proposed to be issued by virtue of this bill shall bear interest of not less than two, nor more than six per cent. per annum, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President."

[Mr. EVANS, of Maine, here remarked that such proviso would be unnecessary, as the notes were made to bear interest already by the act.]

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that by the act they must bear some interest, but it may be barely nominal—the act providing that they shall bear interest not exceeding 6 per cent. at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now my desire is by this amendment to require them to bear as much as 2 per cent. interest.

Again, sir, they are not bills of credit, or money, because they are not payable to bearer, and negotiable by delivery; and this is one of the attributes, if I may so speak, of all paper designed to circulate as money. On the contrary, their negotiability is restrained to some extent at least by their being transferable by assignment endorsed upon them. In section 5th of the act of 1837 it was enacted:

"That the said Treasury notes shall be transferable by delivery, and assignments endorsed thereon, by the person to whose order the same shall, on the face thereof, have been made payable."

The holders of these bills, under my construction of this clause, derive no title, but by an assignment thereon from all who have been prior holders, and thus certainly their circulating quality is limited, if not wholly restrained. I am aware that others place a different construction upon this section, claiming that under it they can be endorsed in blank by the payee, and will, of course, circulate afterwards by delivery. But such I do not hold to be the fair construction.*

These notes are not made a tender—could not be made a tender. There is no obligation, statutory or otherwise, upon any Government creditor to receive them. They are receivable in payment of dues to the Government; but does that make them money? What is that but the extinguishment of the debts of the Government by off-setting debts due to it? So far as they are to circulate at all, that circulation is between the Government itself, its debtors, and creditors. Their circulation is incidental only. They are not based upon the mere faith of the Government, because the act itself sets apart the unappropriated funds which may be in the Treasuy at the time of their maturity for their redemption.

All these things show that they are not money designed to circulate. Well, sir, what are they? In the language of the court before quoted, they are "contracts by which a State binds itself to pay money at a future day for money loaned for present use."

By the letter of the Constitution, Congress has power to borrow money—upon this delegation I rest the matter. And how, sir, borrow money? Why, in the language of the Constitution, "upon the credit of the United States." It is wholly incomprehensible to me how money can be borrowed without the use of credit. It is also wholly unintelligible how credit can be used without some scribe or instrument, as the evidence of the contract of borrowing. Now, if the objection be good to Treasury notes, it seems to me it is equally good against State stock, or Government scrip, or any thing which is the evidence of a loan, and that it does, in fact, make the power to borrow money wholly nugatory.

* Mr. HABERSHAM subsequently offered an amendment, requiring that the notes be negotiable by special endorsement only, and subject to the same rules and restrictions as inland bills of exchange, without liability to endorsers.

SPEECH OF MR. J. C. ALFORD,

OF GEORGIA,

In the House of Representatives, January 22, 1840—On the subject of Abolition petitions.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that I have at last obtained the floor, and have an opportunity of expressing my views in this Hall on the most important question—a question to my constituents of the deepest interest; one that strikes at the existence of the Union.

I will not evade the question. If my friend from South Carolina (Mr. THOMPSON) does not intend by his proposition to reject the reception, I will offer an amendment that shall bring the question directly before the House, and compel this body to decide whether they will or will not receive these petitions. The gentleman signifies his intention is to refuse to receive these petitions; such was my opinion of the object of the resolutions, and under that view of the question I support the amendment.

I will meet this question at once on what its friends are pleased to call its high constitutional grounds. Congress has no constitutional right or power to receive these Abolition petitions; and let me say to gentleman, in all truth and sincerity, that if they decide, in violation of that sacred instrument, that they shall be received, I will say to my constituents from my heart and soul that they have no longer any use for this Union. It will then be to them an engine of the most diabolical oppression. I am ready to say this to them whenever gentleman are ready to decide the question in favor of reception. I place the issue on their reception, and will proceed to demonstrate, on constitutional principles, that Congress has no right to receive, to consider, to report upon, or to grant the prayer of these petitions.

What is the object of these petitions? What do they pray for? Some of them go to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia; some to abolish it in the Territories, and some in the States; and some prey that no new State shall be admitted into the Union if the Constitution authorize the institution of slavery. It is in this broad sense I am about to consider the proposition. What says the Constitution? Let us look to that. I have not come here to appeal to the North, the East, or the West, as men, to protect our rights. I appeal to no men, or set of men—to no party, Whig or Democrat—but I plant myself upon the Constitution of my country, the only basis upon which I am willing to stand. Were it not for this Constitution, I would advise my constituents to go back to first principles; were it not for the protection guarantied to them by this Constitution to enjoy their rights of property, as well as their private and political rights, I should tell them to protect themselves with their own strong arm. And if gentlemen doubt our ability to do so, let them look at this right arm of mine. But we have this Constitution, and gentlemen say they claim the right to present and consider these petitions under that clause which provides that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances." I will not say that one man cannot petition as well as another, but I do mean to say that every one must petition for his own grievance; and I contend that slavery is no grievance. And if it were, it is no grievance of these petitioners, living as they do in States where slavery is not tolerated by law. Each State of the Union has a Constitution of its own; and in the Southern States slavery is authorized by law. Each State legislates for its own people; and the people of our State have no interest in or right to control the legislation of another State, in regard to this question especially.

The right of property held by the master in his servant in Georgia, according to the laws of Georgia, can be no grievance to the citizen of Maine; nor is there any thing repugnant to this right of property in slaves in the Constitution of the United States, but, on the contrary, the Constitution of the United States fully recognises this right of property in slaves, by just and ample provisions for the protection of our people in their domestic tranquillity. And, to insure the blessings of the relative condition of master and servant to us and our posterity, the framers of that instrument inserted a clause which authorized the importation of slaves in this country for many years after its adoption. Let the Constitution speak for itself:

"The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year eighteen hundred and eight; but a tax of duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person."

Thus it seems the Constitution contemplates the existence of slavery in the States through all time; and who now can say in truth that it was ever contemplated by the framers of the Constitution that the people of any part of this Confederacy—the ladies of the North—would send to Congress petitions to interfere with our domestic tranquillity—to interfere with our right of property, and claim that privilege of intermeddling in other people's business upon the ground that our lawful and constitutional rights are a grievance to them? The absurdity of receiving these petitions is obvious to all. To me the proposition seems to violate all the principles of constitutional law as well as every sentiment of humanity and religion. This question can only be the legitimate subject of discussion among the slaveholding people themselves. The General Government has no power, by the Constitution, over the subject. To receive these petitions would imply the power to grant their prayers. Congress has no such power. Hence the absurdity of their reception.

Not only did our father provide for our domestic tranquillity—not only did they authorize the importation of slaves into the States—but, knowing as they did, and believing as they must have believed, from the facts and circumstances of the times in which they lived, that the happiness of our people, their security, and the perpetuity of our Union, depended upon the preservation of the institutions of the South as they found them when they formed the Constitution of the United States, they, with that patriotism and wisdom which distinguished them above all other men who lived before them or will live after them, incorporated into that Constitution a clause declaring that three-fifths of this property shall be represented in the Congress of the United States.

What would the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] with all his knowledge of the Constitution and with his ability in argument in favor of the right of petition on this question, think of a petition sent here from citizens of the South, praying that Congress would abolish the right of representation in New York, the Empire State, and, if the gentleman please, in his own district? Yes, sir, what would he say if the ladies of the South were to petition Congress to infringe the right of representation in New York, to diminish the number of their Representatives, and disfranchise his constituents? I cannot foretell the kind or power of the resistance the distinguished gentleman would offer to such a palpable abuse of the right of petition, and such a violent infraction of constitutional law. Yet such is the course pursued towards the South, and the arguments of the gentlemen on this floor justify it, and amongst these champions of the right of petition in this sense is to be found the honorable gentleman himself.

As I sat out to defend the interest of my constituents on constitutional principles, and as I declared in the outset that I would risk every thing with the Constitution, let us read it again, and see if it is not truly the ark of our political salvation.

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and, excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."

The abolition of slavery would therefore, reduce the number of Representatives from the South to a very great extent, and would be a denial of the right of representation, a positive infraction of the right of representation authorized by the Constitution of the United States, exactly in proportion to the number of slaves represented upon this floor.

Gentlemen complain that, by reason of this representation of slaves, the South has a preponderance in the political scale. Is this the reason that they favor Abolition? Is this the reason they vote to receive these petitions? If so, they seek to rob us of our constitutional measures; and the only means left us to escape the consequences of such a measure would be to go over to Mr. Van Buren's principles, and advocate the right of free negro suffrage; a measure which I detest, and one which my constituents will never submit to.

I ask again, is it right to receive petitions here which strike at the very foundation of Federal representation? which go to dissolve the body politic by an infringement of the high privilege expressly secured to the South in the Constitution?

This principle of representation has been held sacred by the people of this country from the adoption of the Constitution, and by none more cherished than by the freemen of Georgia.

The history of Georgia politics places this right of representation in a strong point of view. But reference to the Journals of this House, there may be found a bold and eloquent argument in the case of Jackson against Wayne, made by James Jackson, of Georgia, a hero of the Revolution, and the father of the Republican party in Georgia, in favor of this sacred constitutional right of representation.

I cannot recur to a name so illustrious, to a man who fought so long and so valorous for freedom, to a Whig of the Revolution, without remembering one of the most prominent causes of that Revolution—a denial by the mother country of the right of representation; and shall we be less tenacious of the right than our fathers? Shall we surrender to a few fanatics, urged forwarded by an unholy zeal, a principle which our fathers refused to surrender so the arms of Europe, and maintained at the cannon's mouth? Never, I hope. God forbid it.

The member from Vermont [Mr. SLADE] made one admission which is fatal to his Abolition doctrines—his right of petition. He says there are some things it would not be proper to petition for. One of his cases is, that it would be improper to petition this body to hang an Abolitionist. I doubt not the gentlemen had some forebodings of what his fate might be if he were to carry his principles into practical operation; in throwing this shield around himself, he has conceded the whole ground. And let me ask the gentleman if it would be less lawful or religious to hang him up to one of these pillars until he was dead, dead, than it would be to arm an incendiary with a torch in one hand and a dagger in the other, to burn my house and murder my family. Yet such is the criminal denunciation of some of these petitioners. They have had the madness to say that if they cannot abolish slavery by law, they will do it with the sword, or, what is worse, they send incendiary pamphlets into our country, to excite our slaves to deeds of insurrectionary warfare.

Mr. Speaker, three years ago about this time, I met the honorable gentleman (Mr. GRANGER) on this floor, and when I attempted to reply to his defence of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ADAMS,) I was gagged down with the previous question. The gentleman, if I remember right, asked us to let them fight our battles at the North.

[Mr. GRANGER denied he had ever claimed to fight the battles of the South.]

Mr. ALFORD said, I am glad of it. I would not trust him or any Northern man to fight our battles with the Abolitionists alone. Let those who would fight for us there, fight with us here. But I fear they are all Whigs, all Democrats on this subject at home; all against slavery in the abstract. The South has been gulled long enough with this right of petition so sacred to the honorable gentleman. Of one thing I am certain: he said then, as he says now, that the North has rights and dare maintain them. The acceptation of these petitions under that clause of the Constitution already alluded to, which secures the right of petition for the redress of grievances, is not one of those rights to which his declaration applied. He should maintain no such a right. What are we to understand by this threat, that the North "has rights and dare maintain them?" We are to be taught, I suppose, that under the authority to petition Congress for a redress of their grievances, they will enforce upon us a reception of Abolition petitions, and trample under their feet our rights of property and representation both.

They charge us with having mixed the right of petition with the question of Abolition, and say that they will dare maintain that right, although they admit that they cannot abolish slavery at all, so long as the Constitution is in force. If they have no right to abolish slavery at all, what right have they to trouble Congress with these petitions? The argument is absurd on the face of it. What means this declaration, this threat, that they dare to do such deeds? Does the gentleman intend to carry this measure by force of arms! Are we to be swept away by the power of the North as the besom of destruction? Is the South to fall by force, without resistance?

I cannot contemplate the possibility of Congress entertaining these doctrines without feelings of horror. If ever this power is once carried out effectually, it will raise a fire of discord, it will light the torch of civil war, and the consuming element will sweep over this nation as the tempest sweeps over the ocean, as the ocean sweeps over the earth when driven by the fury of the warring elements. Before the howling of the tempest shall hush, and the fire of war blast out, the last son of the South shall perish a martyr to our constitutional rights.

Mr. Speaker, I have now in my eye the honorable gentleman from New York who did say three years ago (when, Democrat as he is, he stood by his colleague, Whig as he is, in defence of Mr ADAMS) that the South should let the battle be fought at the North.

[Mr. VANDERPOEL inquired if Mr. ALFORD alluded to him.]

Mr. ALFORD said, I allude to the leader of the Administration forces in this House, to him who leads with a whip, to the gentleman who represents Kinderhook—it is unparliamentary to call members by name—I allude to him who, when New Jersey was stricken from the roll of States, stood upon this floor and thanked God that the voice of Democracy was triumphant in this House; that the voice of the Democratic party in New Jersey had been heard in this Hall. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the voice of Democracy has been heard, and the gentleman rejoices at the fact, and speaks of regenerated States. That voice of Democracy which hails from New Jersey is not the voice of her people, but it is the voice of aliens carted about by Van Buren men to raise the hue-and-cry of modern Democracy, of O'Connell Democracy. Yes, sir, to raise a tumultuous shout of alien, O'Connell, Democratic triumph over the native citizens and legal voters of a gallant State, speaking as they did in favor of the Opposition cause by their own people through the medium of a constitutional Government. But, sir, the voice of the sons of New Jersey cannot prevail; right yields to force, and the voice of law is drowned by a wild and disorderly shout of the mob, which is called here the voice of Democracy—a voice that comes from the land of O'Connell, that breaks upon the shores of New Jersey, that rings through the spell-bound regions of the "enchanted mountains," that wakes up the drowsy inhabitants of "Sleepy Hollow," and they too hail the triumph of this cause of regenerating Democracy, and join the shout of that Democracy, echoed here by the "leader" of "the party" in this Hall.

[Mr. VANDERPOEL asked Mr. ALFORD to yield for an explanation.]

Mr. ALFORD said, after I am done. I found it too hard to get the floor to give it up. I cannot let go my grip until I have said what I have to say. I can tell the gentleman that, unless I am mistaken in the signs of the times, this modern Democracy will soon come to an end. This Van Buren-Calhoun-Bentonian-Buchanan Democracy will blow up at the end of Mr. Van Buren's eight years, if he is re elected, I "guess."

The SPEAKER interposed, and Mr. ALFORD said, sit still, Mr. Speaker, I will go back to argument.

I hold in my hand the most eloquent and conclusive argument in favor of the constitutional rights of the South on this question of slavery, and against the course pursued by these fanatics, I have seen or read; and what is astonishing to all lovers of truth and justice, it is the very speech of William Henry Harrison, from which garbled extracts have been made to prove him an Abolitionist, and for which he has been doomed to encounter the united opposition of the whole South; and this same speech is now published in the Emancipator, under a long editorial denunciation of General Harrison as an anti-Abolitionist, and declaring that no Abolitionist can support him for the Presidency, because he goes with the South. And I am happy, sir, that whilst I use his speech to prove the truth of my position, I am but doing an act of justice to a statesman and a patriot, a friend of the South, who has been misrepresented and belied. Let not gentlemen suppose that I am about to become the advocate of General Harrison for the Presidency. Georgia stands on neutral ground. We have a man of our own—the immortal Troup—who is better qualified to administer the Government, in my opinion, than Harrison and Van Buren both put together. I go for Troup, sir; but if ever he is out of the question, I have a right to enjoy my own opinion as between the other two: and I am willing to judge them by their own acts, and choose between them upon their principles in regard to this very question.

I will now give Gen. Harrison's views as authority on this question. Hear them:

"Extract from remarks of General William Henry Harrison, at the public dinner given him by the citizens of Vincennes, Indiana, on the 25th May, 1835.

"I have now, fellow-citizens, a few words more to say to you on another subject; and which is, in my opinion, of more importance than any other that is now in the course of discussion in any part of the Union. I allude to the societies which have been formed, and the movements of certain individuals in some of the States in relation to a portion of the population in others. The conduct of these persons is the more dangerous, because the object is masked under the garb of disinterestedness and benevolence, and the course vindicated by arguments and propositions which in the abstract no one can deny. But however fascinating may be the dress with which their schemes are presented to their fellow-citizens; with whatever purity of intention they may have been formed and sustained, they will be found to carry in their train mischief to the whole Union, and horrors to a large portion of it, which it is probable some of the projectors and many of their supporters have never thought of; the latter, the first in the series of evils, which are to spring from this source, are such as you have read of to have been perpetrated on the fair plains of Italy and Gaul by the Scythian hordes of Attila and Alaric, and such as most of you apprehended on that memorable night, when the tomahawks and war clubs of the followers of Tecumseh were rattling in your suburbs. I regard not the disavowals of any such intention upon the part of the authors of these schemes, since, upon the examination of the publications which have been made, they will be found to contain every fact and every argument which would have been used if such had been their objects. I am certain that there is not in this assembly one of these deluded men, and that there are few within the bounds of the State. If there are any, I would earnestly entreat them to forbear, to pause in their career, and deliberately consider the consequences of their conduct to the whole Union, to the States more immediately interested, and to those for whose benefit they profess to act. That the latter will be the victims of the weak, injudicious, presumptuous, and unconstitutional efforts to secure them, a thorough examination of the subject must convince them. The struggle (and struggle there must be) may commence with horrors such as I have described, but it will end with more firmly riveting the chains, or in the utter extirpation of those whose cause they advocate. Am I wrong, fellow-citizens, in applying the terms weak, presumptuous, and unconstitutional, to the measures of the emancipators? A slight examination will, I think, show that I am not. In a vindication of the objects of a convention which was lately held in one of the towns of Ohio, which I saw in a newspaper, it was said that nothing more was intended than to produce a state of public feeling which would lead to an amendment of the Constitution, authorizing the abolition of slavery in the United States. Now, can an amendment of the Constitution be effected without the consent of the Southern States? What then is the proposition to be submitted to them? It is this. The present provisions of the Constitution secure to you the right (a right which you held before it was made, and which you have never given up) to manage your domestic concerns in your own way; but, as we are convinced that you do not manage them properly, we want you to put it in the hands of the General Government, in the councils of which we have the majority, the control over these matters, the effect of which will be virtually to tranfer the power from yours into other hands. Again, in some of the States, and in sections of others, the black population far exceeds that of the white. Some of the emancipators propose an immediate abolition. What is the proposition then as it regards those States and parts of States, but the alternative of amalgamation with the blacks, or an exchange of situation with them? Is there any man of common sense who does not believe that the emancipated blacks, being a majority, will not insist upon a full participation of the political rights with the whites, and, when possessed of these, that they will not contend for a full share of the social rights also? What but the extremity of weakness and folly could induce any one to think that such propositions as these could be listened to by a people so intelligent as those of the Southern States? Further, the emancipators generally declare that it is their intention to effect their object (although their acts contradict the assertion) by no other means than by convincing the slave holders that the immediate emancipation of the slaves is called for both by moral obligation and sound policy. An unfledged youth at the moment of his leaving (indeed, in many instances before he has left) his Theological Seminary, undertakes to give lectures upon morals to the countrymen of Wythe, Tucker, Pendleton, and Lowndes, and lessons of political wisdom to States whose affairs have so recently been directed by Jefferson and Madison, Macon and Crawford. Is it possible that instances of greater vanity and presumption could be exhibited?

"But the course pursued by the emancipators is unconstitutional. I do not say that there are any words in the Constitution which forbid such discussions as they say they are engaged in. I know that there are not. And there is even an article which secures to the citizens the right to express and publish their opinions without restriction. But in the construction of the Constitution it is always necessary to refer to the circumstances under which it was formed, and to ascertain its meaning by a comparison of its provisions with each other, and with the previous situation of the several States who were parties to it. In a portion of these slavery was recognised, and they took care to have the right secured to them to follow and reclaim such of them as were fugitives to other States. The laws of Congress passed under this power have provided punishment to any who shall oppose or interrupt the exercise of this right. Now, can any one believe that the instrument which contains a provision of this kind, which authorizes a master to pursue his slave into another state, take him back, and promises a punishment for any citizen or citizens of that State who should oppose him, should at the same time authorize the latter to assemble together, to pass resolutions and adopt addresses, not only to encourage the slaves to leave their masters, but to cut their throats before they do so? I insist that, if the citizens of the non-slaveholding States can avail themselves of the article of the Constitution which prohibits the restriction of speech or the press to publish any thing injurious to the rights of the slaveholding States, they can go to the extreme that I have mentioned, and effect any thing further which writing or speaking could effect. But, fellow citizens, these are not the principles of the Constitution. Such a Constitution would defeat one of the great objects of its formation, which was that of securing the peace and harmony of the States which were parties to it. The liberty of speech and of the press were given as the most effectual means to preserve to each and every citizen their own rights, and to the States the rights which appertained to them at the time of its adoption.

"It could never have been expected that it would be used by the citizens of one portion of the States for the purpose of depriving those of another portion of the rights which they had reserved at the adoption of the Constitution, and in the exercise of which none but themselves have any concern or interest. If slavery be an evil, (and no one more readily acknowledges it than I do,) the evil is with them. If there is guilt in it, the guilt is theirs, not ours, since neither the States where it does not exist nor the Government of the United States, can, without usurpation of power and the violation of a solemn compact, do any thing to remove it, without the consent of those who are immediately interested. With that consent, there is not a man in the whole world who would more willingly contribute his aid to accomplish it than I would. If my vote could effect it, every surplus dollar in the Treasury should be appropriated to that object. But they will neither ask for aid nor consent to be aided so long as the illegal, persecuting, and dangerous movements are in progress of which I complain; the interest of all concerned requires that these should be immediately stopped. This can only be done by the force of public opinion, and that cannot too soon be brought into operation. Every movement which is made by the Abolitionists in the non-slaveholding States is viewed by our Southern brethern as an attack upon their rights, and which, if persisted in, must in the end eradicate those feelings of attachment and affection between the citizens of all the States which was produced by a community of interests and dangers in the war of the Revolution, which was the foundation of our happy Union, and by a continuance of which it can alone be preserved. I entreat you then, fellow-citizens, to frown upon the measures which are to produce results so much to be deprecated."

Without entering into a full detail of the merits of the gentleman at the head of this Government, I turn to the supporters of the Administration, and ask them, if they please, to show me wherein the present Chief Magistrate of this Union ever held such language as this? Has he ever declared that the abolition of slavery would be unconstitutional? On the contrary, has he not declared and admitted that, with the lights before him, he could not say but that it might be abolished? Has he ever said that the "efforts" of these petitioners were "weak, injudicious, presumptuous, and unconstitutional? Has he ever "entreated them to pause in their career?" No man can answer in the affirmative to these questions for Martin Van Buren, with truth and sincerity. What has he said—what has he done? "Let us render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's." In that great and truly alarming agitation of the question of slavery as regards the State of Missouri, Mr. Van Buren proved, by his vote, that he was opposed to slavery; and not only that he was opposed, but that he would refuse to admit a State into the Union rather than her people should judge and act for themselves in the question of slavery. He voted in the Legislature of New York to instruct an ultra Federalist (Rufus King) to refuse the admission of Missouri into this Union if her Constitution recognised slavery. I do not give the words of the resolution, but the substance.

Where was old Tippecanoe at that vastly important crisis in our affairs? Side by side in this House with those that led the van in favor of slavery—side by side with the Republicans of the South, he made a full and glorious sacrifice of himself for the people of Missouri. He voted to sustain her constitutional right of slavery, and was beaten out of Congress for the part he took in behalf of Southern interests and Southern institutions. Is the gentleman from Missouri in the House? Oh, Missouri! (Oh, Misery!) What has Mr. Van Buren done for you?

If Mr. Van Buren had done as much for us as General Harrison, I would not hesitate to marshal myself in his ranks at once, as he now pretends to be so much of a State rights man; but still I fear his measures. His message recommends strict economy, (good,) but he intimates very plainly that, after all the economy he recommends has been used by us, there will still be a deficit of revenue, and leaves us to infer, as I understand him, that more will be wanting. How we are to raise it under the plans in his message, without an increase of tariff duties, is not for me to say. The South may look out. I pass over many of his acts; and come down to his last public act, by which he proves himself to be now what he was in early life—the constant, uncompromising enemy of Southern institutions. I mean his vote in regard to slavery in Florida. On every occasion where he has voted on the question of slavery, he has voted against it,

Extract from the Senate Journal.

"The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the establishment of a territorial government in Florida; and, the bill having been amended, it was reported to the House accordingly; and,

"On the question to concur in the amendment to the 11th section, to strike out, after the word 'freedom,' in the 11th line thereof, the residue of said section, as follows:

"'No slave or slaves shall, directly or indirectly, be introduced into the said Territory, except by a citizen of the United States removing into the said Territory for actual settlement, and being, at the time of such removal, bona fide owner of such slave or slaves; or any citizen of the United States travelling into the said Territory with any servant or servants, not exceeding two; and every slave imported or brought into the said Territory, contrary to the provisions of this act, shall, thereupon, be entitled to and receive his or her freedom.'

"It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 20.

"On motion by Mr. Mills, the yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,

"Those who voted in the affirmative are—

"Messrs. Barbour, Benton, Brown of Louisiana, D'Wolf, Eaton, Elliott, Gaillard, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Lloyd, Macon, Noble, Pleasants, Smith, Southard, Stokes, Van Dyke, Walker, Ware, Williams of Mississippi, Williams of Tennessee.

"Those who voted in the negative are—

"Messrs. Barton, Beardman, Brown of Ohio, Chandler, Dickerson, Findlay, Holmes of Maine, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lewric, Mills, Morrill, Otis, Palmer, Parrott, Ruggles, Seymour, Thomas, Van Buren."

The enemies of Mr Van Buren have denied him one quality which he possesses in an eminent degree—that of courage. In "treading in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor," he has exhibited no signs of faltering. A soveregn State has gone by the board, and he shows no signs of alarm. Gen. Jackson, in his prime, never dared to do a deed so bold. Hundreds and thousands of American citizens have been disfranchised by an Executive edict, issued, no doubt, in secret, to be carried into effect by the Clerk of this House, and the party here, by which a State loses five out of six of her Representatives, for the sole purpose of giving the President and his party the power to rule this House, and, through the action of this House, to secure his re-election. Is not this a monstrous usurpation? Has history any parallel? Tyrants have dissolved legislative bodies by force of arms, but here the President wills it, and it is done almost without a struggle.

Mr. Speaker, I have said it, and I repeat it here, elected as I was by the State Rights party of Georgia to a seat in this House, on the principle that I stood in opposition to this Administration—elected by a party opposed to Mr. Van Buren—opposed to measures enumerated by me in this effort in behalf of my constituents as belonging to him—I cannot consent to be counted among those who follow his Administration, and I seek this early opportunity to "define my position," that I may not be suspected by any man living.

A man like me, Mr. Speaker, who has ever been accustomed to roam at large in the beautiful forests of his own, his native land, uncontrolled even by parental authority, cannot submit to be harnessed with the shackles of party, and collared with Van Burenism. No, sir; no, sir. I will go against this Administration as long as it goes wrong, and when it goes right I will go hom'.

[Some member replied, you will remain here a long time, my dear sir.]

If I were compelled to take sides in the contest between William Henry Harrison and Martin Van Buren, I would not hesitate to support the man who declared in 1835, that the conduct of the Abolitionists was "weak, injudicious, presumptuous, and unconstitutional;" and that too, in a non-slaveholding State, and to a non slaveholding people. The man who stood by Missouri—the General who protected the great valley of the Mississippi by his deeds of valor, and secured to its inhabitants peace and protection in place of danger and alarm—such a man is General Harrison. And, if I were to conceal my preference for him over Mr. Van Buren, I should act uncandidly to my friends, and dishonestly with myself. He pronounced the efforts of the Abolitionists unconstitutional. I am proud to call his opinion to aid my own. Hence I say, refuse to receive these abominable petitions, and disregard these fanatics.

SPEECH OF MR. SOUTHARD, OF NEW JERSEY.

In Senate, April 3, 1840.—On the bill making appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road.

Mr. SOUTHARD made the following remarks, in substance:

Mr. PRESIDENT: This bill, when presented by the committee, appropriated $450,000 for the continuation and improvement of the Cumberland road within the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois—being 150,000 to be expended within the present year in each of those three States. Upon the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON] by a very large vote, it has been reduced to $75,000 for each State—making, in the whole, $225,000. For this amendment I gave my vote. The Senate has also declared its opinion, by a very decisive majority, against the substitute proposed by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY.] His substitute offered to relinquish to those States, for the construction of this road, the two per cent. fund, as it is usually called—which is two per cent. upon the amount which may hereafter be received from the sales of the public lands which lie within their limits and in the State of Missouri, provided they would, by acts of the State Legislatures, thus accept it, as a bar to any further appropriation by the Government for this road. The amount of this two per cent. fund it is impossible to estimate with any thing like strict accuracy. It ought, from the lands yet unsold, to amount to one or two hundred thousand over a million of dollars. But no safe calculation can be made of the time within which these lands will be sold, nor when those States would receive the money. For present use, and for the continuance and prompt completion of the road, the grant would be utterly without value.

The objections to this proposition arise out of the nature of the fund to be granted, and from the future relation of the Government to the road, and seemed to me so obvious that I had no difficulty in giving my negative to it. It purported to be a grant, and to bestow a benefit, when no positive good could result to the grantees. It assumed the appearance of kindness, while, in fact, it was mere mockery of their hopes. But it had also a much worse aspect. It severed, forever, the connection between the Government of the Union and this great, and, in my estimation, invaluable internal, yet perfectly national, improvement. To this I could not reconcile my judgment or my feelings. And the remarks I propose now to make will explain, both to the friends and the opponents of this road, the reasons which governed me in my vote against that proposition.

The question before us is on the passage of the bill, in its present form, appropriating $75,000, to be expended in each of those three States during the present year. Shall we appropriate $225,000 for the Cumberland road within the present year? My reasons for stating the question in this form will be apparent to those who will condescend to listen to me.

I have brought myself to the clear and undoubting conviction that it is not my duty to vote for the appropriation. And as this conclusion does not conform to my previous votes, I desire to state the grounds on which I do not, and those on which I do rest my justification. This is due to many of my own immediate constituents, who have thought it proper to observe my conduct; but much more due to my professed regard for constitutional principles, and a wise and economical administration of the Government. And, insignificant as I or any member of this body may be, he is not, and cannot be unimportant, in his action and his votes, upon any question which affects the constitutional construction, or the present policy and future destiny of the country.

In answering this inquiry, I have to say—

1. That I have no difficulty as to our constitutional power. I differ on this point from many of the opponents of this bill, with whom I shall vote. I believe the power to appropriate money for internal improvements exists. I derive my convictions on this subject, in the first place, from the language of the Constitution, from several of the powers which are not only conferred upon this Government, but, as I believe, solemnly enjoined upon it.

I do not now, for it would be impertinent, enter upon the argument. My object is to prevent a misconstruction of my vote in regard to the principle. I believe that we are at perfect liberty to pass this bill, and, in my opposition to it, desire not to be misunderstood as putting our right in dispute, so far as I am concerned. I regard this question, in the present case, as one of expediency, rather than of constitutional power.

But I derive my convictions, in the second place, from our relations to this Territory—under the grants from the States of the lands northwest of the Ohio, under the ordinance of 1787, under the terms of admission to the Union of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and our absolute right and proprietorship of much of the soil within those States, as these topics have been explained and illustrated by the Senators from New York and Massachusetts [Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. WEBSTER,] though they differed as to the reasons which most prevailed with their judgments. I concur with both, to a great extent. I differ from both on some inferior points. But I refer Senators to their arguments, as giving a satisfactor view of our right to expend the money of the nation on this road. I only desire to say that I shall not vote against this bill, because I believe that I have no legal and constitutional right thus to expend it.

I ought, perhaps, to add that I utterly deprecate the modern notion by which the power has been limited. When reason shall resume its sway on such questions, freed from personal devotion to men and party sympathies, this notion will, I hope, be regarded as the highest point of political absurdity and popular delusion. I allude to the doctrine that such internal improvements as this most invaluable road are not embraced within our powers, but that we may expend the public money on rivers, lakes, &c. provided there be a port of entry or deposite above the point of the improvement. If experience had not taught me otherwise, I should believe that no man, conversant with our Constitution and laws, could become its advocate, unless his mind was, to some degree, affected in its action by his devotion to men, because, in the integrity of his heart, he believed that the general character of the political opinions of him or them who promulgated it, was, in the main, correct and beneficial to the country. He must yield to the particular absurdity, in order to sustain the general policy of those whom he supported. What is this doctrine, when stripped of the party aspect? Its common sense is neither more nor less than this: That the power to expend money upon roads, canals, rivers, &c. arises from the power to regulate commerce; that this power is confined, so far as these expenditures are concerned, to the collection of the revenue; that this revenue is collected from customs, at all ports of entry and deposite; and, therefore, that we must be confined to those parts of streams which lie below such ports! In other words, that we may create a port of entry or deposite where we please, even at the head spring of a stream, and, having done this, the constitutional power arises, to expend as much money as we please, below such port, no matter on what bays, or creeks, or brooks, we may locate them. Thus, on a mere brook, or at the head spring of one of our rivers, we may in virtue of our high constitutional power, create a port, and then set ourselves to work to clear out the stream, or make roads to it. Within the last ten years have constitutional powers been thus derived. When present party conflicts pass away, where is the Senator who will maintain them? And where is he who will consider a creek in Ohio as within our constitutional benevolence, while the Delaware is excluded? For I cannot forget that an appropriation for the latter was vetoed, while one for the former was regarded as quite constitutional.

The Senate will perceive that I have no difficulty in voting for this bill from any objections as to constitutional power. In the second place, I have no hostility to this road. Why, upon what principle or feeling, general, local, or political, should I feel hostility? I cannot, for myself, assign any. Others may conjecture some one to which I am myself insensible. If they can I shall give them credit, if not for candor and fairness, at least for great ingenuity. The original plan and policy in regard to this road was right. It was consistent with the enlarged views of Washington, as applicable to a great avenue from the seaboard to the West. It gave access to the wilderness. It has created wealth and people. Its benefits are not to be measured by the two per cent. fund, or any other fund. It has tempted and drawn to the West multitudes who would not have gone there without it, and has been one of the most effective means in the creation of the young but vigorous States in the valley of the Mississippi. It has been worth hundreds of millions to the whole Union.

Nor, Mr. President, do I dread its becoming useless on account of the agency of steam upon other lines of connection between the East and West. Much less do I fear that we shall be tempted to push it forward to the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific ocean. I hope it will find its termination there, and rejoice in the anticipation, both of the blessings it will dispense and the glory it will confer on the Government and nation. Such views have from the beginning governed me in regard to it. I have not heretofore thought my duty fully discharged by merely voting for the appropriations for the road, but I have struggled for it in debate. My name is, I believe, to be found in its favor in every year of my official life as Senator. My friend from South Carolina (Mr. PRESTON) will recollect, if other Senators may have forgotten, how earnestly, on more than one occasion, I have resisted his views in regard to it. I shall on this occasion be with him in my vote. I have been its uniform advocate, and am now its unwavering friend.

Why, then, vote against it? My duty to myself and to the friends of the road requires me to state the reasons; and this shall be briefly done, and must be done briefly, if at all, from the difficulty which I still find, on account of indisposition, in addressing the Senate.

We are not now to decide whether this road shall be forever surrendered. Its friends estimate too strongly the effect of a refusal to make an appropriation for the present year. The road and its claims on the Government are not surrendered by such refusal. No appropriation was made last year. Yet those claims were only postponed, and exist as strongly now as they did then. Refuse the appropriation now, and there will be, or ought to be, delay only. The claim and right will exist unimpeached. The obligations of the Government will continue unimpaired.

I am not so intimately acquainted with, for I have not studied, the political and party relations to this subject in the four States chiefly affected by it, as to justify me in making comments on that aspect of the case. Nor am I capable of estimating the influences which may now operate on members from them, or the use which will or may be made of the votes which may now be given. I cannot indeed look round this chamber—see the seats which are vacant, when the final question is about to be taken—and recollect what has occurred in the debate, without perceiving that this question does, in some mode, operate strangely upon this body. But I cannot guide myself by these symptoms. And if I shall cross the path of any, so be it—whether of friend or adversary, the act is mine, not theirs. My vote will be influenced to some extent by the conduct of the Executive, and the state of the Treasury. The one I regard as disingenuous, unfaithful, and leading to consequences which I would resist. The other as unable to bear the appropriation at this time.

This road has been, for more than a quarter of a century, the steady object of annual appropriation. It is worthy of this constant benefaction, and has been, year by year, found among the items in the estimates for the support of the Government in all the successive Administrations, until at last it came to be regarded as one of the ordinary expenditures of the Treasury. Even during the times when the most false of all the professions of economy ever uttered to delude and mislead were indosed on the nation, and when the power to make any work of internal improvement was denied, and every thing else failed to find favor, this road had its regular annual appropriations. Last year, I believe for the first time, it failed; by whose fault it is not necessary for me to say. The Administration had the power to secure it. I, at least, and most of my political friends, were not in fault. Much less are we answerable for the shameless and unprincipled use which is said to have been made of the fact in the region through which the road runs. Every Senator understands this, and I desire to pass from it to other topics.

At the commencement of this session the President sent to us a message, in which he referred to the condition of the Treasury—informed us that he had directed the estimates for the support of the Government to be strictly canvassed and reduced to the lowest point consistent with the public interest. After doing this, he read us a lecture on economy, such an one as is not to be found in any communication from the Executive to the legislative branch of the Government, in all its history, so far as my observation has extended. He even trod in the footsteps of his predecessor, and alluded to the veto on our extravagance, intimating regret that practice forbade its use, as to the amount of appropriations. The insincerity of his language will appear presently, unless he has found cause for repentance and conversion.

But will the Senate listen to his language:

"To avoid this, (the creation of additional burdens and taxes,) and to keep the expenditures within reasonable bounds, is a duty second only in importance to the preservation of our national character, and the protection of our citizens in their civil and political rights. The creation in time of peace of a debt likely to become permanent, is an evil for which there is no equivalent. The rapidity with which many of the States are apparently approaching to this condition, admonishes us of our own duties in a manner too impressive to be disregarded. One, not the least important, is to keep the Federal Government always in a condition to discharge, with ease and vigor, its highest functions, should their exercise be required by any sudden conjuncture of public affairs—a condition to which we are always exposed, and which may occur when it is least expected. To this end, it is indispensable that its finances should be untrammelled, and its resources, as far as practicable, unencumbered. No circumstance could present greater obstacles to the accomplishment of these vitally important objects, than the creation of an onerous national debt. Our own experience, and also that of other nations, have demonstrated the unavoidable and fearful rapidity with which a public debt is increased when the Government has once surrendered itself to the ruinous practice of supplying its supposed necessities by new loans." The struggle, therefore, on our part, to be successful, must be made at the threshold. To make our efforts effective, severe economy is necessary. This is the surest provision for the national welfare; and it is, at the same time, the best preservative of the principles on which our institutions rest. Simplicity and economy in the affairs of State have never failed to chasten and invigorate Republican principles, while these have been assuredly subverted by national prodigality, under whatever specious pretexts it may have been introduced or fostered.

"These considerations cannot be lost upon a people who have never been inattentive to the effect of their policy upon the institutions they have created for themselves; but, at the present moment, their force is augmented by the necessity which a decreasing revenue must impose. The check lately given to importations of articles subject to duties, the derangements in the operations of internal trade, and, especially, the reduction gradually taking place in our tariff of duties, all tend materially to lessen our receipts; indeed, it is probable that the diminution resulting from the last cause alone will not fall short of five millions of dollars in the year 1842, as the final reduction of all duties to twenty per cent. then takes effect. The whole revenue then accruing from the customs, and from the sales of public lands, if not more, will undoubtedly be wanted to defray the necessary expenses of the Government, under the most prudent administration of its affairs. These are circumstances that impose the necessity of rigid economy, and require its prompt and constant exercise. With the Legislature rests the power and duty of so adjusting the public expenditure as to promote this end. By the provisions of the Constitution, it is only in consequence of appropriations made by law that money can be drawn from the Treasury; no instance has occurred since the establishment of the Government, in which the Executive, though a component part of the legislative power, has interposed an objection to an appropriation bill on the sole ground of its extravagance. His duty, in this respect, has been considered fulfilled by requesting such appropriations only as the public service may be reasonably expected to require. In the present earnest direction of the public mind towards this subject, both the Executive and the Legislature have evidence of the strict responsibility to which they will be held; and, while I am conscious of my own anxious efforts to perform with fidelity this portion of my public functions, it is a satisfaction to me to be able to count on a cordial co-operation from you."

After this modest, becoming, and candid lecture, the Secretary of the Treasury sends us the estimates; and, by his order, tells us that the income of the Government will be $18,600,000, and, with the money in the Treasury at the beginning of the year, will amount, at most, to $20,158,385—which will be all that can be expended without the creation of a national debt. He also sends us the estimates which are regarded as necessary for all objects within the year, and they amount to about $40,000,000; and he adds, by way of confirmation to the Presidential lecture, "If Congress should make appropriations to the extent desired by the different Departments," &c.

Now, sir, what do these papers mean? "If Congress make appropriations to the extent desired," &c. Then the Departments (in other words, the Executive) do not desire any appropriations beyond those which are sent, the items of which are enumerated, and amount to the twenty millions. This appropriation for the Cumberland road is not among them. If, therefore, we pass this bill, we go beyond the means of the Government, and we give that which the Executive declares it does not want. We force on the Government an expenditure which the President and Secretary have excluded, denounced as not necessary, and against which we are warned, not with an actual veto, but with expressions which sound like regret that the practice would not permit it, and with a lecture on economy, and an intimation that we shall be regarded as extravagant and prodigal.

If this be not the plain meaning of these papers, official documents between the Departments of our Government have become not the honest, straightforward communications between public agents, seeking, or bound to seek, the public good, and that only, but the double dealing hypocrisy of parties seeking to entrap each other.

And I now say to the friends of the bill, if you are disappointed, look to the true source of that disappointment. The Executive has frowned upon the measure. Had it been embraced in the estimates, and the President and Secretary had not prepared to throw the blame of expenditures beyond our income from themselves, and fasten it upon Congress, your fate might and would have been different. The friends of this work might have pursued their accustomed course. But they are called upon to pause when they are not only to be denounced for prodigality, but the confidence which their constituents may repose in them is to be assailed, and their influence in support of other great questions of constitutionality and expediency weakened.

Does any Senator suggest that this view exhibits either subserviency to Executive will, or fear of denunciation from the advocates of power? He is in error. No one, here or elsewhere, will probably accuse me of subserviency to Executive dictation; but I like to place responsibility in the proper quarter, and do not choose, when I can avoid it without injury to the public interests, to permit mere contrivance, and calculation, and cunning, to prevail so as to mislead popular opinion, and do injustice to important principles in the concerns of the Government.

As to the fear of denunciation, I have been too long accustomed to its venom to feel much dread of it. My days of sensibility on that point have passed, when I am called upon to discharge my office. But this idea is connected with both public, and, if you please, party interest. The men in whom I have confidence were dislodged from power more by the unfounded and false imputations of extravagance than any other cause; and the misrepresentation is kept up to this hour, and thousands are misled by it; even when the public records show that those who are called extravagant and prodigal expended only twelve millions per year, while those professors of economy have expended in a single year three times that amount. Is it right that such men should preach economy, refuse to recommend necessary appropriations, induce others to unite with a part of their friends, (for it is manifest that a part only are to vote for this bill,) and then throw the blame on their opponents? Yet, sir, I would not in the least be turned aside by this consideration, but leave to time the vindication of the purposes of those who should best merit approbation, if I did not find in the actual condition of the Treasury a persuasive argument in favor of the vote I shall give.

Let us look, for a moment, at that condition, and see what are the inferences which we ought now to draw from it.

Your whole revenue for the year, according to the Secretary, amounts to very little over twenty millions of dollars. The estimates of the ordinary expenditures reach that sum. Without this appropriation there will be not one cent to spare, even if the anticipation of the receipts shall be verified. I do not believe that they will be verified. The receipts, thus far, from the customs and other sources, do not, as I am informed, justify this hope. On the contrary, before Congress adjourns, we shall discover necessity for a new loan. The five millions of debt which we have just created will be doubled or trebled. But, suppose my fears are without foundation on this point, and that we receive the full amount of twenty millions. The whole, every dollar, must be expended on the subjects embraced in the estimates of the Secretary, and which we are admonished not to exceed. But, sir, are there not other subjects on which we must—we have no alternative—on which we must direct money to be expended? Can we avoid it, if we would? And did not the Secretary and President know this when they sent to us the message and the report? Did they deal fairly with us and the people, when they warned us to keep within the estimates?

Where is your Sub-Treasury bill? It has passed this body. It is before the House, and, as the President and his counsellors, under the dictation of the Hermitage, have staked their characters and success upon it, it must pass, and be put into operation. Well, what will this cost? We have calculations of the salaries, sales, chests, vaults, &c. and they have amounted to a moderate sum. I do not believe them accurate. You cannot, with all your economy—especially the economy of the present day—put this system into full and active operation for much, if any, less than $100,000. Others may differ from me, and consider my opinion as extravagant. So be it. Make it half that sum. Did not the Executive know, or believe, that this was to be provided for? Or were they under the conviction that the scheme had done well for popular effect, and its actual execution might be postponed or evaded? If the former, then this is an item beyond the estimates.

Again. The Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. HUBBARD) has urged upon us a bill to pay the losses in Florida by Indian depredations. A portion of the claims to be satisfied by that bill, or by specific appropriations, are just, and, as an honest Government, we cannot altogether reject the whole of them. What they will amount to no man can foresee, but certainly much beyond $100,000. These we must provide for beyond the estimates. There is, also, a bill to raise 1,500 troops, with their officers, for special service in Florida. What will their support amount to? The claim of Massachusetts reaches nearly to $300,000; the precise sum, I believe, is $272,716 14, without interest. The number of the various and heavy drafts upon the Treasury, from such large demands, I do not attempt to calculate.

Then, how many private claims and pension cases are there? And to what will they amount? These are all beyond the estimates, which we are told not to exceed. And permit me here to say that justice and good faith, and the wise and proper administration of a Government of the people, demand, with irresistible urgency, that these claims, when honest, ought to be first satisfied. I know that many false and base claims are exhibited. This not only calls on us for caution and examination, but renders our duty none the less pressing in regard to those which are just. So strong is my conviction on this point, that, if driven to decide between paying them and appropriating for a general object, in which States are concerned, I should not hesitate to prefer the former and postpone the latter.

Is it not then perceived that many, and some of them large, appropriations must be made for objects not within the estimates? Where, but by borrowing money, can we obtain the means? And did not the Executive know this when the lecture on economy was read, and the estimates sent to us? There is not, I believe, a single year in our history in which it has not been the duty of Congress to expend money beyond the estimates, and they know it. And if we are compelled to appropriate for other objects beyond their calls, how are we to get the money? By reducing the amounts they ask for? Will they consent to lessen our civil list? Will they diminish our burdensome and, in some cases, most useless army of diplomatic agents abroad? It is not to be presumed that they and their friends will support either. Will they lessen the appropriations for the army? Can this be done, in the face of the difficulties upon every part of our borders? It will not be attempted. On the contrary, we have already one bill for the annual occupation of Florida, and that is followed by another for fifteen hundred additional troops. Besides, in the existing condition of our defences, on every part of our borders, on the ocean and the land, and with the aspect presented by our Indian and foreign relations, how can we assent to any diminution? Will you take it from the navy? Shall we continue, as we have always done, to support it by praises on its gallantry and glory, and by a narrow dispensation of our means to render it efficient, and give it substantial energy and strength? In our hour of danger, and when its flag must be our bulwark and protection against insult and devastation, we may feel that in our hours of ease we have forgotten our first and highest duty. Do not, I entreat, lessen the little that belongs to it.

How, I ask, in this state of things, shall we meet our absolute wants? It can only be done by a new loan. We have passed a bill to issue Treasury notes, to make a loan, to create a debt for five millions of dollars. Some one has said that our Treasury is thus replenished. How replenished? Like the purse of any other debtor—by borrowing It will enable us to pay for the present, but the borrowed money must be returned. I am glad that it is now openly avowed that the issue of Treasury notes is the same in substance as making a loan—creating a national debt. When, some three years ago, I so argued about it, I was denounced through the country as basely misrepresenting the facts, and slandering the Administration. The acting chairman now admits that they are one and the same thing—that issuing five millions of Treasury notes is creating a debt of five millions, to be hereafter paid as our revenues come in and enable us to do it. I have no confidence in the assertion that this loan will be discharged by the end of the year. It is more probable that before the end of the session we shall be called on to double or treble the amount of our loan—to increase largely our debt. This is now, I think, the fourth year that we have been borrowing, in this mode, to meet the expenses of the Government; and of these loans there remained unpaid on the first of January last, $2,750,0. 0—that is, our public debt was to that amount. The present loan must be used to pay that amount, and there will then remain only $2,250,000 for the use of the year. Will that answer? Will not the sources of expenditure to which I have referred demand more, much more than that sum? I do not doubt it.

Look back to the last three years, and see what have been the expenditures of this economy-loving and economy-practising Administration. I ask the Senate to recollect the statement made a few days ago by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] I use it for illustration on this point, and refer to the documents for its accuracy. On the 1st January, 1837—three years ago—there was in the Treasury about $6,00.,000
On the 1st January, 1840, there was - - - 1,566,000

Balance - - - $4,444,000

This balance was, of course, a part of the revenue which accrued previous to January, 1837, but which has been expended in three years previous to 1840.

In addition to this, the fourth instalment payable to the States has been retained and expended in the same time, say - - - - - - 9,000,000
The Bank of the United States has paid - - 5,000,000
This also is expended.
And our existing debt due on Treasury notes - 2,750,000

In all about - - - $21,194,000

This makes about seven millions which this Administration has expended in each one of the three last years, over and above all the receipts, incomes, and revenues of the Government. But this is not all. I think the Senator from Massachusetts omitted a very important item. It will be recollected that, in March, 1836, in consequence of the great fire in New York, Congress thought proper to suspend the payments of duty bonds in that city. These bonds were for duties accruing and payable in '35 and '36, and were thus a part of the revenues of those years. But, in consequence of the suspension of payment, they were not paid in '35 and '36, but a very large amount of them was paid in '37, '38, and '39. What this amount was I could not this morning lay my hands on the papers and documents necessary to show with any accuracy. But it was very large—amounting to several millions. This, too, has been expended. And when it is added to the sums before stated, it will appear that the Government has, for three years, expended in ease and every year between eight and nine millions—in all, between twenty-four and twenty-seven millions beyond all its receipts. The fact is worthy of serious reflection. What hope can there be that we shall, with such an Administration, make our expenditures fall within our income? What hope is there that we shall pay this five millions which we have just borrowed? Of that five millions, more than one-half, nearly three-fifths must go to the payment of our existing national debt. The balance will fall far below our wants. If we have, for three years, spent an average of about eight millions more than our income, how can we expect to keep our expenditures within the diminished revenue of the present year? We shall find the hope absurd; and we must meet this appropriation for the Cumberland road, with the full consciousness that, by making it, we create a new national debt, or augment it, by that amount, in a time of peace, and, as we are kindly assured by the Executive, of high prosperity.

I have less faith in the promises to redeem our debt, and make the expenditures equalize with our income, on account of the professions of the Executive Departments. We are told by the President and Secretary, in substance, that if the banks had paid what is due from them, the outstanding Treasury notes, our present debt, would have been paid. Is this true? What do all the deposite banks owe us? On the 1st of January, 1840, the Secretary says, $1,149,904. What was the amount of our notes or debt? It is stated by him at $2,750,000. Can the latter sum be discharged by the former? The one is much more than the double of the other. Why, then, was this representation made? Was it to deceive us? No; but rather to keep up the cry against the banks as the cause of our embarrassment. How unworthy is such an effort to deceive and delude the high stations from which it emanates!

There can be no relief to this view from the fact that there is something more than two and a half millions to be received in the course of the present year from the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania. The bank has heretofore paid punctually to the Government every thing which we had a right to demand and did demand from it. It has performed its contract, thus far, in paying for the stock which we hold, on the terms proposed by the Government, and I do not doubt that it will continue to do so. But this two and a half millions are not yet due by several months, and afford no apology for any complaint that the Government could pay off our debt because the banks held its money. The only ground for this pretence is, that the Administration deposited our money, imprudently, in banks which could not or would not pay when called on; and the amount they owe, even if paid now, would leave us in debt about one and a half millions. Besides, I have been informed that a considerable portion of this sum has been satisfied since the 1st of January. It may be feared by some that all will be satisfied in the course of the year, because then our President and the parasites who court the favor of the people by the cry of banks, banks, will be deprived of one of their most favorite themes of declamation and political warfare.

It is apparent to my mind, whether it be to others or not, that, if we make this appropriation for the Cumberland road, we must create or augment a national debt; disregard the official exposition of the Treasury, and subject ourselves to the charge of forcing on the Executive expenditures which are disclaimed by it. Let me not be told that I have voted for this road when a national debt existed. I did so; but it was at a time when two or three circumstances separated the case widely, very widely, from its present position.

1. That national debt existed—had been created long before in sustaining our national rights and honor. It was a debt which rested alike on us and our posterity, who, equally with us, were to be benefited by the liberties which its creation secured.

2. There had been full and ample provision made for its redemption It was in a course of reduction quite as rapid as our desires or the interests of the country demanded.

3. The revenues of the Government were sufficient to pay that debt, and to meet all its necessary expenditures, and to make the appropriation for the road over and above them all. We were not compelled to create a debt, or augment a new one, in order to meet the utmost wishes of the friends of this road, among the most ardent of whom I still desire to rank myself.

Now, and at this moment, all these points are adverse to us. We have no debt such as those of the Revolution and of 1812. Our income does not, by several millions, equal our ordinary expenses, and our revenue is utterly incompetent to meet this appropriation.

I stand, then, Mr. President, in my vote against this bill, on—1. The entire admission of its constitutionality, its expediency, and the obligation of the Government to carry it forward, when circumstances will permit, to the extent which its ardent friends desire; and for this I shall vote, whenever, and so often, as I shall feel at liberty, from the condition of the Treasury and the country. 2. On the message of the President and the report of the Secretary, which admonish me to be guarded in my votes which shall expend money; for which they are without means to meet it; and I hold them, or, rather, the whole Administration, guilty of the conduct which prevents me from the gratification of my own wishes and opinions, and deprives the country of the multiplied blessings which this road is capable of conferring, and has heretofore conferred. 3. On the fact that, if we make this appropriation, we must create or augment a new national debt. And I believe, while we are doing this to pay the honest debts of the Government, satisfy the just claims of private citizens, and defend the country from foreign and Indian aggression, it is wise not to add to it for this object, but rather to let it be postponed for a time; and I hope that time will be short.

My conclusions are strengthened by this reflection. The Executive has disavowed this appropriation, refused to admit it among the wants of the Government, and has urged upon us a rigid regard to economy. If, in opposition to all this, we pass the bill, increase our debt, augment our expenditures, what is the impression to be made on public opinion? Will it not be be distinctly and clearly this, that the Executive branch of the Government is economical, and the best and safest guardian of the public treasure? that the Legislative branch is prodigal and squandering, and regardless of wasteful expenditures, the friend of national debts? Will this, can it be favorable to the true theory of our institutions? Will it not pervert that whole theory? turn the public favor still more strongly towards the Executive power? increase and strengthen it? And have we not seen enough within the last ten years—do we not know enough of the ancient and modern failures of liberty and free institutions, and enough, too, of the opinions of our Revolutionary fathers, to make us pause and hesitate when this aspect of the question is presented to us?

Mr. President, I shall give my vote with pain. I know that I shall wound feelings of friends whom I love; and in whose principles and patriotism I confide. But I cannot avoid it. If they choose to forget my unwavering friendship for this road, and find enough for this end in a vote to postpone, not destroy, the accomplishment of their wishes, so be it. If, for one such vote, they please to cancel the account between us, let the account be cancelled. I shall regret it, but neither complain of them, nor repent an act which my best judgment approves.

SPEECH OF MR. HABERSHAM,

OF GEORGIA.

In the House of Representatives, March 24, 1840—On the Treasury note bill.

The bill authorizing the issue of five millions of dollars in Treasury notes being under consideration in Committee of the Whole, Mr. HABERSHAM of Georgia offered the following amendment to the second section:

"Which notes to be issued shall be negotiable only by special endorsement by and to each person through whose hands they may pass, subject to the same rules and restrictions as in land bills of exchange payable to order, but without the liability of the endorser."

Which having been read, Mr. HABERSHAM addressed the committee in support of the amendment as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I have been induced to offer this amendment to the bill because the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has stated that the Treasury notes which by this bill the Government is authorized to issue, are not intended to circulate as money. I am further induced to offer this amendment, in consequence of some remarks which my eloquent friend and colleague (Mr. NISBET) has this evening made, in the course of which he has said that, according to what he supposed was the fairest construction of the act of 1837, of which this bill is but a continuation, these notes were made negotiable only by assignment thereon from the payee and from all subsequent holders; and that thereby their circulation as money would be restrained; although he admitted that the act of 1837 would bear a different construction. My colleague admitted at the same time, and this seems to have been generally conceded by those who have engaged in this debate, that Congress has no constitutional power to "emit bills of credit." Such is my respect for the judgment and purity of purpose of my colleague, that it is with great reluctance I ever differ with him, and I am happy to find now that the only difference between us is, that I believe that Treasury notes, issued in the form prescribed by the act of 1837, are bills of credit, and will circulate as money, notwithstanding they are payable to order, and must be endorsed by the payee; while he is of opinion that they are not bills of credit, and will not circulate as money, because, by his construction of the act, these notes are made negotiable only by assignment thereon by the payee and by all subsequent holders, and thereby their circulation as money would be restrained, though admits that this provision of the act would bear a different construction. The difference between us, then, is simply a difference in the construction of a single provision of the act, admitted by him to be of doubtful construction. Now, if the doubt which he admits to exist can be removed, and all the declared objects of the bill be at the same time attained, so that while these notes may be used as promissory notes by the Government, in satisfaction of demands against it, or as pledges on which to raise loans, without assuming the character of paper money, or of being circulated as such, it is certainly most desirable that such alteration and provision shall be made as will remove all doubts as to the constitutionality of the measure. It is with this view I have offered the amendment, which, if adopted, will, in my opinion, remove the doubt and obviate the objection. It proposes that the notes to be issued shall only pass by special endorsement, which, while it will preclude the idea of their circulating as money, and give them the caracter of mere promissory notes or inland bills, will enable the Government to use them to discharge its immediate obligations, or as pledges on which to borrow money. Now, if the object really is to use these notes merely as means to raise money, and not to put them in circulation as paper money, I think the chairman of the committee cannot, or rather ought not, to hesitate to remove all constitutional doubt, by accepting the amendment In that event, and if the amendment be made, I can, and will with great pleasure, vote for the bill; because I believe that the Government really needs the amount asked for, and I am disposed to grant it, if I can do so in a shape which I believe to be constitutional. I am unwilling to resort to a loan on the issue of stock certificates, because that will not only require the establishment of transfer offices, but will operate to fasten again upon the country a national debt of permanent character, redeemable at long periods—an evil which I am most anxious to avoid. Independently, however, of these reasons for a preference of Treasury notes in the form I propose over an issue of stock certificates, there is another reason which, in the present state of the currency and of exchanges, deserves a grave consideration. It is, that Treasury notes transferable by special endorsement will afford both a convenient and safe medium of exchange, and will, in that mode, greatly add to the circulation of the country, as bills of exchange, without assuming the distinctive character of paper money; while stock, from the difficulties and delays in the forms and modes of transfer, will contribute but in a very limited degree to so desirable an object, and would be liable to the same fluctuations in value. The Treasury notes, in such cases, would in fact be only a new form of stock on which to obtain a loan more convenient to the stockholder, because transferable with more facility, and yet with a negotiation sufficiently restrained to prevent them from circulating as paper money or bills of credit, in the sense attached to those words as used in the Constitution. If, then, those who represent the Government are really sincere in this matter, and do not intend these notes to circulate as paper money, why not adopt the amendment I have proposed? If they do not intend them to enter into the circulation as money, why not impede the circulation to the extent proposed by me? If they do not intend to emit them as bills of credit, and to use and circulate them as paper money, why not say so at once, openly and above board, and that this violation of the Constitution is justified by the necessity of the case; that money cannot be raised constitutionally by borrowing it on the credit of the Government, and that, therefore, they must make money to meet the exigency, though without the constitutional power to do so?

Now, why not come out boldly, and say so, and prove to us that the money cannot be got in the constitutional mode, by borrowing in time to meet the exigencies of the case? I say, why not do this? The answer is obvious: because they know that in the mode I propose, the money can be borrowed immediately; or, even if it could not, the Treasury notes, in the form I propose, would answer for the immediate exigency. The truth is, they are unwilling to call things by their right names; unwilling to call it a loan, because the idea of a loan, a debt, would not be palatable to the people. But call it by what name they will, give it what shape they may, it is still a loan; it is still a national debt of five millions, and the promises of the Government are out to pay that amount at some future day. The necessity does not exist. If it did, this would be a law, necessary and proper to carry into effect a granted power, and its constitutionality would be put on that ground. The necessity does not exist, so far as even to justify the exercise of a doubtful power; and its constitutionality would be put on that ground. The necessity does not exist, so far as even to justify the exercise of a doubtful power. The money can be borrowed, and borrowed at once. When that necessity does exist; when, as in case of war, and after the power to borrow is exhausted, because there are none able or willing to lend; when it becomes necessary for the safety of the country to exercise a doubtful power, or even to violate the Constitution by issuing Treasury notes, payable to bearer, to circulate as money, I will then be willing, and not till then, to emit bills of credit, or continental money, or any thing else, which will serve the purposes of Government; and will justify my vote on the necessity of the case, and on the principle of self-defence, which, with nations, as with individuals, overleaps all laws and all constitutions. But I do not believe that such extreme necessity does now exist, and therefore, in the present shape of the bill, and without the amendment I propose, I cannot vote for it.

I have said that the difference between my colleague, (Mr. NISBET,) the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. JONES,) and myself, is this: they say that the notes proposed by this bill are not "bills of credit," as that term is used in the Constitution. I say that they are. We all agree that Congress has no power to emit bills of credit. It has already been made to appear by my honorable friend and colleague, (Mr. KING) in his able argument on this question, by the testimony of Mr. Madison, that the Convention, by a vote of nine States to two, refused to grant this power; and the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BIDDLE) has rested his argument on even a broader basis, for he shows that the words which were stricken out by the Convention were, "That Congress shall have power to emit bills on the credit of the United States." He is no doubt correct; but I deem it to be unnecessary for the purposes of the argument to use other words than those which have been used by my colleagues. I am content to take the words to be as they are in that section of the Constitution which prohibits the States to emit bills of credit. I am content to lay aside altogether the authority of the Madison Papers, to lay aside altogether the fact that this power was refused to the Federal Government by the Convention. I am willing to rest the question on the Constitution as we have received it; to rest it simply on the inquiry, In what part of the Constitution do you find the power granted to "emit bills of credit?" No where. In this, all, I believe, agree. The naked question then presents itself, Is the issue of Treasury notes, in the form and manner designated by the act of 1837, "to emit bills of credit?" If so, this act is unconstitutional; if not, then it is constitutional.

What was meant by the words "to emit bills of credit," as used in the Constitution? In reply to this inquiry, I cannot better begin my answer than by adopting the language of Mr. Justice Johnson, in the case commonly known as the Missouri case, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the year 1830, and reported in 4 th Peters

"It is only by resorting to the nomenclature of the day of the Constitution that we can hope to get at the idea which the framers of the Constitution attached to the words 'emit bills of credit.' The whole history and legislation of the time prove that, 'by bills of credit,' the framers of the Constitution meant paper money, with reference to that species of paper money which had been used in the States from the commencement of the century down to the time when it ceased to pass, before reduced to its innate worthlessness"

To what source of more purity or accuracy can we resort for the ascertainment of this history than to the decision of the Supreme Court, in the same case, pronounced by Chief Justice Marshall?

"We learn (he says) from Hutchinson's History of Massachusetts that bills of credit were issued, for the first time, in that colony, in 1690. An army, returning unexpectedly from an expedition against Canada, found the Government totally unprepared to meet their claims. Bills of credit were resorted to for relief from this embarrassment. They do not appear to have been made a tender, but they were not, on that account, less bills of credit." "Paper money was also issued in other colonies, both in the North and South, and, whether made a tender or not, was productive of evils in proportion to the quantity emitted. In the war which commenced in America in 1755, Virginia issued paper money at several successive sessions, under the appellation of Treasury notes. This was made a tender. Emissions were afterwards made in 1769, in 1771, and 1773. These were not made a tender, but they circulated together—were equally bills of credit—and were productive of the same effects. In 1775 a considerable emission was made for the purposes of war. The bills were declared to be current, but were not made a tender. In 1776 an additional emission was made, and the bills were declared to be a tender. The bills of 1775 and 1776 circulated together—were equally bills of credit, and were productive of the same consequences. Congress issued bills of credit to a large amount, and did not, perhaps could not, make them a legal tender. This power resided in the States. In May, 1777, Virginia passed an act making the bills of credit issued by Congress a legal tender so far as to extinguish interest. In 1781 Virginia made all the bills of credit which had been issued by Congress, and all which had been issued by herself, a legal tender in payment of debts. Yet they were, in every sense of the word, bills of credit previous to that time, and were productive of all the consequences of paper money."

Such is the concise history of bills of credit in this country prior to the adoption of the Constitution. These bills of credit, when issued by Congress, are better known by the name of Continental money.

Let us hear again what the Chief Justice says in the same case on the same subject:

"During the war of our Revolution we were driven to the expedient of emitting bills of credit, and necessity compelled us to use them to a considerable extent. The term has acquired an appropriate meaning; and bills of credit signify a paper medium intended to circulate between individuals, and between Government and individuals, for the ordinary purposes of society. Such a medium has been always liable to considerable fluctuations. Its value is continually changing, and these changes, often great and sudden, expose individuals to immense losses, are the sources of ruinous speculations, and destroy all confidence between man and man. To cut up the mischief by the roots—a mischief which was felt through the United States, and which deeply affected the interest and prosperity of all, the people declared in the Constitution that no State should emit bills of credit. If the prohibition means any thing—if the words are not empty sounds—it must comprehend the emission of any paper medium by a State Government for the purpose of common circulation."

The people had experienced, sadly experienced, the monstrous evils of such emissions. Thousands of individuals had been ruined, and all had suffered, more or less, by the rapid depreciation and ultimate worthlessness of such a medium. The paper, whether issued by Congress or by the States, had alike become utterly valueless. It was to prevent these evils in future that, by the Constitution, the States were prohibited from emitting bills of credit. It was unnecessary to extend the prohibition to Congress, for Congress could not possess the power unless by express grant. Now, if the Convention refused to Congress the power to "emit bills of credit," or bills on the credit of the United States, I would say, in the language of the Chief Justice, "If it means any thing, it must comprehend the denial of the power to Congress to emit any paper medium like that of the Continental money, for the purpose of common circulation."

Again, in the same case, Judge Marshall asks:

"What is the character of the certificates issued by the authority of the act of Missouri under consideration? What office are they to perform? Certificates, signed by the auditor and treasurer of the State, are to be issued by those officers in amounts not exceeding ten dollars, nor less than fifty cents. The paper purports on its face to be receivable at the Treasury, or at any loan office in the State of Missouri, in discharge of taxes or debts due to the State. It also pledges the faith and funds of the State for their redemption."

Again he says:

"Had they been termed 'bills of credit,' instead of certificates, nothing would have been wanting to bring them within the terms of the Constitution. And can this make any real difference? Is the proposition to be maintained, that the Constitution meant to prohibit names and not things? That a very important act, big with great and ruinous mischief, which is expressly forbidden by words most appropriate for its description, may be performed by the substitution of a name? That the Constitution, in one of its most important provisions, may be openly evaded by giving a new name to an old thing? We cannot think so. We think the certificates issued under the authority of this act are as entirely bills of credit as if they had been so denominated in the act itself"

Such are the views of the Supreme Court as delivered and sanctioned by Chief Justice Marshall. Before I proceed to comment upon them, and to apply them to the bill before the committee for the emission of Treasury notes, I will trouble the committee with a reference to the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case commonly known as the Kentucky case, decided as late as the year 1837, and to be found in 11th Peters. In that case, the opinion of the Court was delivered by Mr. Justice McLean, and I now quote from that opinion:

"It would be difficult to classify the bills of credit which were issued in the early history of this country. In some cases they were payable with interest, in others without interest. Funds arising from certain sources of taxation were pledged for their redemption in some instances, in others they were issued without such pledge. They were sometimes made a legal tender, at others not. In some instances a refusal to receive them operated as a discharge of debt, in others a postponement of it. They were sometimes payable on demand, at other times at some future period. At all times they were receivable in payment of taxes, and of debts due to the public, except, perhaps, in some instances, where they had become so depreciated as to be of little or no value."

After commenting on the definition of the Supreme Court in the Missouri case, to which I have already referred, the court says:

"The definition which does include all classes of bills of credit, emitted by the Colonies or States, is a paper issued by the sovereign power, containining a pledge of its faith, and designed to circulate as money. To constitute a bill of credit within the Constitution, it must be issued by a State, on the faith of the State, and be designed to circulate as money. It must be a paper which circulates on the credit of the State, and is so received and used in the ordinary business of life."

The direct question before the Supreme Court in this case was, whether the notes of the Bank of Kentucky were bills of credit within the meaning of the words "bills of credit" in the Constitution:

"The notes contained no pledge of the faith of the State in any form. They purport to have been issued on the credit of the funds of the bank, and must have been so received by the community. These funds were in part only derived from the State. In making loans the bank was required to take good securities; and these constituted a fund, to which the holders of the notes could look for payment, and which could be made legally responsible. In this respect the notes were essentially different from any class of bills of credit which are believed to have been issued." 'But," again says the court, "there is another quality which distinguishes these notes from bills of credit. Every holder of them could not only look to the funds of the bank for payment, but he had in his power the means of enforcing it. The bank could be sued."

On these two grounds, then, that there was an actual existing fund pledged for the redemption of these notes, and that this fund could be made liable, by suit, for their redemption, the Supreme Court decided that these notes were constitutionally issued, and were not within the constitutional meaning of the words "bills of credit."

Mr. Justice Thompson, in concurring with the opinion of the Court, says:

"The two great infirmities which attended the bills of credit which circulated as money, and came within the mischief intended to be guarded against by the constitutional prohibition, were, the want of some real and substantial fund being provided for their payment and redemption, and no mode provided for enforcing payment of the same."

This distinction is a satisfactory answer to the objection which has been raised, that, if a State, by the prohibition or want of power to "emit bills of credit," cannot issue Treasury notes in the form proposed by the bill before the committee, it follows as a necessary consequence that bank notes of a bank incorporated by a State or by the United States were unconstitutional, because that which a State or the United States could not do directly could not be done by a bank incorporated by a State or by the United States. On these two solid grounds of distinction rests the constitutionality of all the bank notes of the country, whether issued by a bank owned by the State or by individuals.

From the examination which I have just made of the two cases I have referred to, the committee may now arrive at the precise definition of the words "bills of credit," the power to issue which was refused to Congress and prohibited to the States. The bill or note must be issued by a State, or by her agents in the name or on the faith of the State, and be designed to circulate as money. There must be no real or substantial fund pledged for its redemption, and which may be made liable by suit for its payment, and no party against whom a suit may be brought on the note.

Now, let us proceed to examine whether the Treasury notes proposed to be issued by this bill will be subject to all these infirmities. If so, they are clearly unconstitutional, at least according to two successive opinions of the Supreme Court—a court whose decisions are entitled to the highest respect, and which alone is empowered, in the last resort, to decide upon the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of an act of Congress.

The Treasury notes which are by this bill directed to be issued are described in the act of October 12, 1837, of which this bill is only a continuation. They are to be of denominations not less than fifty dollars. They are redeemable after the expiration of one year from their dates. They are to bear an interest, to be expressed on the face of the notes, for one year from the date, and no longer. The rate of interest is to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the President, but shall not exceed six per centum per annum. They are to be reimbursed at the Treasury of the United States, and for this reimbursement, at the time or times specified, the faith of the United States is pledged. The notes are to be signed, on behalf of the United States, by the Treasurer, and countersigned by the Register. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, with the approbation of the President, to issue such amount of the notes as he may deem expedient, in payment of debts due by the United States to such public creditors, or to such other persons as may choose to receive them in payment at par; and like authority is given to borrow, from time to time, not under par, such sums as the President may think expedient, on the credit of such notes. The notes "shall be transferable by delivery and assignment endorsed thereon, by the person to whose order the same shall, on the face thereof, have been made payable." They shall be receivable in payment of all duties and taxes laid by the authority of the United States, of all public lands sold by the United States, of all debts due to the United States. And lastly, that so much of any unappropriated money as may be necessary for the purpose is, by the 8th section, appropriated for paying the principal and interest on the said notes. These are all the provisions of the law which are applicable to the subject in question. Now, what is the result of these several provisions? Why, this is it. That the denominations of the notes are to be less than $50; that they are payable at an uncertain day after the expiration of one year from date; that they bear an interest at the discretion of the President, not exceeding six per cent. but which may be fixed as low as one mill, as was done in the late issue, being equivalent to no interest at all; that the notes shall be signed by the Treasurer, and countersigned by the Register, on behalf of the United States; that they shall be transferable by delivery, after being endorsed by the payee, without further endorsement; that they shall be receivable in payment of all dues, taxes, and debts due to the United States; and the only pledge for their redemption is any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated at the time they fall due, and the faith of the United States. Further, the notes are to be issued in payment of debts due by the United States to such of the public creditors, or other persons, as may choose to receive them, or on their credit money may be borrowed. Now, such being the exact character of these proposed Treasury notes, and such the uses to which they are to be applied, and such the pledges for their redemption, I would ask the committee to which of the infirmities of "bills of credit," as stated in the decisions of the Supreme Court, are they not subject?

These notes, like the bills of credit, are issued by the United States—they are signed in behalf of the United States by agents. They are payable at an uncertain future day. They are issued on the faith of the United States There is no real or substantial fund pledged for their redemption—no one against whom a suit can be brought to enforce payment. No one will contend that money which may be in the Treasury a year hence, not otherwise appropriated, is either a real or substantial fund, or any fund at all. That there is no spare money now in the Treasury is evident from the fact that this loan is needed. The Treasury notes issued last year under this very act, and with the same pledge, are still in part, say two millions, as yet unredeemed, and there is no unappropriated balance in the Treasury to redeem them. The same may, and no doubt will, be the case when these notes fall due; and can that be termed a real or substantial fund which has no present existence, and the future existence of which is dependent upon improbable contingencies? Assuredly no one will contend that there is a real or substantial fund pledged for the redemption of these notes. Lastly, there is no party against whom a suit can be brought. The United States cannot be sued. Those who have signed the notes are on the very face of the notes mere agents, authorized to act, and known to all to be acting only as agents, and of course cannot be liable to a suit on the notes. These notes, then, are subject to all the infirmities which are ascribed by the Supreme Court to "bills of credit," except one. They must be designed to circulate as money. Does this form an exception? Are they not designed to circulate as money, and will they not so circulate? True, the act does not expressly declare that such is the design; but it is not necessary that the design should be expressed. But may not the intention exist, and be inferred from all the circumstances of the case, without an express declaration of the design? In almost every case where the intent is material, is that intent or design not ascertained from the circumstances of the case? In cases of homicide, larceny, contract, in the construction of statutes, is not the intent inferred from the circumstances of the case? Have not all the Treasury notes which have been heretofore issued at various times, under circumstances precisely similar, and, in form, the same as these, and for like sums, and negotiable in like manner, circulated as money? Did not those which issued during the last war circulate as money? Have not those which have been issued in the last two years under this very act circulated as money? If an act has been known in our past experience always to produce certain results, will not the intent to produce the same results to be inferred from the voluntary commission of the act? Would not the voluntary commission of the act be conclusive of the intent? Have not Treasury notes always circulated as money, and will they not do so again? Is it not then the design of their emission that they shall circulate as money? Who can doubt it?

But what is meant by "circulate as money?" Bank notes, which pass by delivery from hand to hand, and are paid, or received, in payment of debts, circulate as money, and answer all the common purposes of gold and silver coin in the circulation. Because the denominations of such notes are as great as $50 and $100, does that change their character, or prevent them from circulating as money? Assuredly not. Because bank notes are not a legal tender, does that prevent them from circulating as money? Assuredly not. Because, in some cases, they have been made payable to order, at a future uncertain day, and were required to be endorsed by the payee in blank before they were put into circulation, did they not circulate as money? Did not what were called the post notes of the late Bank of the United States—the $5, $10, and $20 notes—which were made payable to the cashiers of the branches, or order, and were endorsed by them, circulate as money, as freely as the notes of the same denomination payable to bearer? Now, if all this is true of bank notes, is there any obstacle interposed or existing to prevent these Treasury notes from circulating as money? They are issued and received by the Government in payment; their denominations are the same as bank notes which circulate—say $50 and $100. After the payee, who will probably be some clerk of the Treasury, or, to use the words of the act, "after the person to whose order, on the face thereof, they are payable," has by delivery and assignment endorsed them, they will pass by delivery only, without further endorsement, in the same manner as if originally payable to bearer. Wherein, then, do they differ from the post notes of the late Bank of the United States, before referred to, and which circulated as money as freely as any other bank notes? The conclusion, therefore, is inevitable, that they will circulate as money. If such is not the design, why refuse to throw obstacles in the way of their circulation? Why not adopt the amendment I have proposed, to make them transferable only by the special endorsement of each person into whose hands they may come? This would at once present a serious obstacle to their free circulation, but none to the negotiating or transferring them as pledges on which to borrow money. The very refusal to adopt this amendment will be strong evidence of a design to circulate them as money. Does any one doubt that they will circulate as money? If I am right, then, in the several positions I have endeavored to establish, these Treasury notes will possess all the infirmities of "bills of credit;" will, in fact, be "bills of credit;" and of course, as such, unconstitutional.

Mr. Chairman, there are two conclusions to be drawn from these decisions of the Supreme Court. First, that these proposed Treasury notes are unconstitutional; secondly, that bank paper is constitutional. It has struck me, sir, with great surprise, that a paper circulation so unconstitutional as that of Treasury notes should not only be countenanced, but even urged upon the country, by an administration which professes to be anxious to give to the nation a constitutional currency. That an Administration which condemns bank paper as unconstitutional currency, should insist upon substituting for it a paper issue so unconstitutional. That an Administration which condemns bank paper because of its liability to fluctuation and depreciation, should sound unceasing praises in favor of a Government paper, at least equally liable to fluctuation and depreciation. Sir, all past experience has proved that Treasury notes or Government paper money will depreciate whenever the amount issued exceeds the amount of receipts into the Treasury. During the Revolution the bills of credit ceased at last to be of any value whatever, and ruined thousands. During the late war, even those Treasury notes which bore an interest of five or six per cent. and were issued from necessity, depreciated from ten to fifteen per cent. yea, more, below the par value, and, if the war had continued a few years longer, would have fallen to fifty per cent. below par. Even after the war, they did not reach par value until they were made receivable in payment of subscriptions to the Bank of the United States. Our ancestors, who had experienced all the evils of such currency, wisely endeavored, in framing the Constitution, to guard their descendants from like suffering; and now this Administration, professing to be the warm advocate of a hard money constitutional currency, and professing, too, to guard the Constitution from violation, by strict construction both in theory and practice, is now about to inundate the country with a paper currency, unconstitutional and liable to all the evils of bank paper, without any of its virtues. Sir, these are strange inconsistencies, which it will be difficult either to reconcile or to justify before the people. If the amendment is not adopted, I cannot vote for the bill.

SPEECH OF MR. HUNT,

OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, June 3, 1840—On the Sub-Treasury bill.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I can well imagine that gentlemen who anticipate a dead majority in favor of the bill under consideration may feel impatient at any delay; yet, as this is the only distinctive measure of the Administration, and believing the time not misspent which may be employed in honest endeavors to arouse the people of this country (ere too late) to a sense of their condition, I cannot content myself with giving a mere silent vote. I rejoice, sir, that the Administration, after having fought under cover for ten years past against the best interests of this country, has at length thrown off disguise, and now stands forth the avowed enemy of the credit system, and of banks as forming a necessary part of that system.

Before proceeding to assign some of my objections to the present bill, allow me to carry back the recollection of gentlemen to the origin of this warfare, and to trace briefly the manner in which it has been conducted. The retrospect may be serviceable as showing, on the part of rulers, consummate tact and cunning systematically employed to ruin credit and enlarge Executive patronage; and, on the part of the people, a blind credulity in professions unparalleled in the history of the world.

Previous to 1828 banking had been kept separate from the politics of the country; matters of business had been considered as the common property of men of all parties; all met upon 'change, in the shop, and the field, upon a perfect equality; business knew no political tests any more than it did religious ones; and, by common consent, all men met in their business relations in friendship, asking on the one hand, or giving on the other, no further preference than such as inevitably belongs to superior skill, industry and economy.

It was left for the present day, a day of small lights, small things, and small men, to institute a police having special charge of the associations and business of private life; and accordingly, whilst I am speaking, report says that the Monumental city is the theatre of a court of inquiry, presided over by a gallant soldier from my own district, (Gen. Wool,) for the important purpose of ascertaining whether Major Lendrum and Captain Dusenbury, of the army, have really presumed to patronize Whigs in the purchase of Government supplies.

In 1829, the present Executive of the nation was Governor of the State of New York; and, in his Message of the 6th of January, 1829, to the Legislature of that State, he says:

"To dispense with banks altogether is an idea which seems to have no advocate; and to make ourselves wholly dependent upon these established by federal authority, deserves none. If these are correct views, the only alternative would seem to be between a renewal of the charters of the sound part of the existing banks, or to anticipate the winding up of their concerns by the incorporations of new institutions."

To understand fully the bearing of the language I have quoted, allow me to say that, at the time of the delivery of this message, there were in New York, in operation, forty banks, with a capital paid in of fifteen millions. Of this forty, the charters of thirty-one were about to expire. It will readily occur to every mind that a most favorable opportunity was here presented of checking the increase of what is now considered a great evil—banking institutions. And I can almost fancy I hear the friends of the President (not entirely familiar with the machinery of New York politics then in operation) asking why he did not avail himself of this favorable opportunity to put in practice the doctrines of the present day?

Mr. Chairman, I answer this question, which I know must suggest itself to the mind of stranger—the answer can afford no information to the New York politician of that or this day—the whole thing was then, as now, well understood by us of New York.

The monetary concerns of the State (and, as soon as might be, of the country) were to be connected with its politics—with the central power, holding the dispensation of patronage and office, then resident at Albany.

This, sir, is the answer. This explanation shews you why Mr. Van Buren, a native of the most commercial State in the Union, and then its Governor, had not then discovered the evils of banking—the evils of credit.

Well, sir, as every body knew they would, a Legislature composed of the partisans of the President proceeded, with all convenient speed, to carry out his views, and on the 2d April, 1829, the act commonly called and known as the safety-fund bank act became a law of the State of New York. Sir, I opposed that act with such force as I possessed; and so did the friends of my country, with whom I then and still have the honor to act. But, sir, the machinery was put in operation in spite of lamentations in or out of my own Legislature; and the banks in number increased from forty, as they stood in 1829, to ninety-six chartered ones, as they stood on 1st January, 1840. They increased from a capital paid in, in 1829, of $15,000,000, to a capital, as it stood on 1st January, 1840, of $36,891 460.

But, sir, this is not all; and that you of the Old Dominion, and others, who know very little of the peculiar features of Van Burenism in my own State, may understand something of its beauties, permit me to say that three commissioners were to be appointed to superintend the concerns of the banks. And, sir, let me tell you these gentlemen commissioners, dependent for their existence upon the central political power to which I have alluded, possessed a more irresponsible power and control over the banking institutions of my own State than was ever possessed by an Eastern Sultan over his harem, or an autocrat of Russia over his serfs.

And, sir, the half is not yet told. Before these learned and independent bank commissioners had an opportunity of exercising their fatherly care for the good of the party, there was another process necessary to be gone through in the organization of the new banks—a process equally well calculated to give satisfaction to business men and inspire confidence in the entire purity and patriotism of the party and its creatures, the commissioners. This process was the distribution of stock to subscribers in the fifty six new banks created under Van Buren auspices.

Sir, the party, for party purposes, (not business or commercial,) wanted a bank at Kinderhook, the birth-place of the President. This reasonable want was of course satisfied. So, too, a bank was wanted in Troy, my own city; but it was a business institution that was asked for there, and not a political one. Still, sir, as the bed of the party was of a fixed and iron length, why, of course, the wants of Troy, commercial as she was, had to submit to the prescribed measure of Procrustes. Well, sir, the party have asked for the charter; of course it is granted; and three commissioners are appointed by the same party to distribute the stock. You are ready, I have no doubt, as an honorable, high-minded man, to say to me, those stocks were distributed according to business wants. Sir, let me tell you you are much mistaken. The party was to be taken care of; and as stocks, during these palmy days of Van Burenism, were eagerly sought for, and bore a high premium, why, of course, connections of bank commissioners, male and female, worthless and irresponsible, and some even upon the jail limits of my State, received large distributive shares of stock, and the next day pocketed an advance of five, ten, or fifteen per cent. on that stock, as the case might be, in selling out to some unfortunate Whig, whose only recommendation was his business habits, wants, and ability to pay for, own, and keep stock. Sir, the profligacy of this whole system has been so alarming as to excite the attention of the highest judicial tribunal of the State in more than one instance, and, in at least one instance, call for and receive the attention of a grand jury in presenting one of these precious creatures of political favoritism as a fit subject for the penitentiary. To such an extent was this system carried, that honest men, of all parties, sought relief from it in the passage of what is commonly called the "free banking law" of my State—a system that went into operation under the most unfavorable auspices, and which, thus far, has had to struggle with the monetary embarrassment produced by the action of Government, superadded to the deadly hostility of every locofoco federal recipient of the favors of monopolies.

Thus, sir, in New York (my native State) began the connection between politics and banking; the control, by a central power at Albany, through the creation of banks; the distribution of stock by political commissioners; and the supervisory power of partisan bank commissioners of the monetary affairs of the State. This was done by the so-styled Democracy, the no bank party; and partisans made their per centage, in the way of premium upon stocks they could neither pay for nor keep, and political influence was given and most fearfully wielded.

Let us now shift the scene from Albany to Portsmouth—from New York to New Hampshire—and contemplate a movement simultaneous (if not concerted) with the one we have witnessed in New York, and tending to the same object.

In the summer of 1829, Jeremiah Mason, President of the branch Bank of the United States at Portsmouth, refused to lend his branch to the political schemes of Isaac Hill, and President Biddle refused to remove Mason from office. This spirit of independence gave offence, and hostilities against the Bank were immediately commenced at the East.

It has been said that the extraordinary man who then presided over this country had some private grievances of his own, arising out of transactions of the Bank in the Southwest, the memory of which he had kept fresh. Be this, however, as it may, the quarrel was soon made his own by General Jackson, who changed the battle field from Portsmouth to Washington.

In the message of General Jackson, of December 8, 1829, he says:

"The charter of the Bank of the United States expires in 1836, and its stockholders will most probably apply for a renewal of their privileges."

Again: "Both the constitutionality and the expediency of the law creating this bank are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens; and it must be admitted by all that it has failed in the great end of establishing a uniform and sound currency."

Again: "Under these circumstances, if such an institution is deemed essential to the fiscal operations of the Government, I submit to the wisdom of the Legislature whether a national one, founded upon the credit of the Government and its revenues, might not be devised, which would avoid all constitutional difficulties, and, at the same time, secure all the advantages to the Government and country that were expected to result from the present bank."

In the message of December 7, 1830, General Jackson says:

"Nothing has occurred to lessen, in any degree, the dangers which many of our citizens apprehend from that institution [the United States Bank] as at present organized."

Again: "It is thought practicable to organize such a bank, with the necessary officers, as a branch of the Treasury Department, based on the public and individual deposites, &c.

Here we have very distinctly shadowed forth the project of a Treasury Bank—that kind of Government engine provided for in the present bill, by those who deem it glory enough to follow in the footsteps of "the greatest and best."

We have, too, an assumption which, by its very boldness and disregard of facts, was well calculated to command credence. The State papers to which I have referred speak as flippantly of the unconstitutionality of a National Bank as they would have done had the writer been entirely ignorant that such men as George Washington, James Madison, and John Marshall had given the sanction of their mighty names to its constitutionality.

And, in the same spirit, these papers assert that "a uniform and sound currency" had not been established.

As this is mere assertion, standing opposed to the experience of forty years, I will not insult the intelligence of those who hear me by reasoning upon the subject, but will venture to meet it by an assertion, supported by all fact and experience, viz. that no Government in the world possessed, or ever did possess, so sound and uniform a currency as the Government of these United States at the very time spoken of.

Thus far we have no direct intimation of hostility to State institutions of credit, but a course of remark well calculated to deceive those interested in State banks; and, accordingly, we find the State institutions, actuated in part by cupidity, in part by political motives, embarking with great zeal in the crusade against the monster, the Bank of the United States.

On the 11th July, 1832, in the veto message, General Jackson says, "that a Bank of the United States, competent to all the duties which may be required by the Government, might be so organized as not to infringe on our own delegated powers or the reserved rights of the States, I do not entertain a doubt. Had the Executive been called upon to furnish the project of such an institution, the duty would have been cheerfully performed."

The Government deposites were removed from the Bank of the United States in September, 1833; and on the 26th of that month, Mr. Taney, then Secretary of the Treasury, wrote to the president of the Girard Bank, in Philadelphia, as follows: "The deposites of public money will enable you to afford increased facilities to commerce, and to extend your accommodation to individuals."

On the 9th of October, 1833, the same Secretary wrote to the president of the Maine Bank, at Portland, thus: "The deposites of the public money will enable you to afford increased facilities to the commercial and other classes of the community; and the Department anticipates from you the adoption of such a course respecting your accommodations as will prove acceptable to the people and safe to the Government."

Similar instructions were given to the other deposite banks; and about the first of May, 1836, thirty six of these deposite banks held of the Government money $38 496,755 09.

When we reflect that, at the time I am speaking of, it was the boast of the Administration that the State banks were abundantly competent to perform all the duties previously performed by the United States Bank, and to supply the wants of a great people emphatically commercial, the tendency as well as object of the instructions I have quoted cannot be mistaken. Thus stimulated, if not commanded, the State banks did increase their loans; and the States themselves started off in a race of competition in the creation of new banks.

In 1830 the number of banks may be estimated at three hundred; in January, 1835, at seven hundred and fifty, with a circulation double what it was in 1830. Florida, during the years 1835, '36, proposed an increase of banking capital of $12,000,000, and New York, in the winter of 1836, increased her bank capital $5,670,000.

On the 2d of December, 1834, General Jackson, in his message, thus speaks:

"Happily it is already illustrated that the agency of such an institution [Bank of the United States] is not necessary to the fiscal operations of the Government. The State banks are found fully adequate to the performance of all services which were required of the Bank of the United States, quite as promptly, and with the same cheapness. They have maintained themselves and discharged all these duties, while the Bank of the United States was still powerful and in the field as an open enemy; and it is not possible to conceive that they will find greater difficulties in their operations when that enemy shall cease to exist."

Mr. Woodbury, in his report of 8th December, 1835, says:

"This Department takes pleasure in stating that the public money continues to be collected and deposited, under the present system of selected banks, with great ease and economy in all cases, and with greater in some than at any former period. The transfers of it to every quarter of the country where it is needed for disbursement have never been effected with more promptitude, and have been made entirely free of expense to the Treasury. The payments to creditors, officers, and pensioners have been punctual and convenient; and the whole fiscal operations through the State banks have, as yet, proved highly satisfactory. Incidental to this, the facilities that have been furnished to the commercial community in domestic exchanges were probably never greater, or at so moderate rates."

In his message of 5th December, 1836, General Jackson says:

"To retain it in the Treasury unemployed in any way is impracticable. It is, besides, against the genius of our free institutions to lock up in vaults the treasure of the nation. To take from the people the right of bearing arms, and put their weapons of defence in the hands of a standing army, would be scarcely more dangerous to their liberties than to permit the Government to accumulate immense amounts of treasure beyond the supplies necessary to its legitimate wants. Such a treasure would doubtless be employed at some time, as it has been in other countries, when opportunity tempted ambition."

This language was held in immediate reference to the then surplus revenue, but the argument is equally applicable to the bill under consideration, so far as the bill is calculated to withdraw the people's money from circulation and lock it up in vaults and safes.

Again, he says, in the same message:

"Experience continues to realize the expectations entertained as to the capacity of the State banks to perform the duties of fiscal agents for the Government at the time of the removal of the deposites."

Mr. Woodbury, in his report of the 6th of December, 1836, says: "The money in the Treasury has been safely kept during the year 1836.

Let us here pause; for we have now traced our rulers down to a period within five months of the universal crash in money matters which took place in the spring of 1837, and the effects of which were felt throughout the length and breadth of the land. Pausing here, it is certain the cry that all was well was the fallacious one of a drunken, sleepy sentinel upon his post. Did our rulers know the untruth of their statements? If so, a poor compliment is paid the heart. Were they ignorant? If so, a poor compliment is paid the head. In either view, from a defect of heart or head, or both, their incompetency is most manifest.

Well, the suspension of 1837 came. It surprised no one except our rulers, the very men who, of all others, should not have been surprised, (perhaps they were not, but they affected to be;) for they had been forewarned, and should have been fore armed. For years, the other part of this Hall had rung with the eloquence of the great orator from the West, and of the Constitution's champion from the East, predicting, almost with prophetic accuracy, the disastrous results of the experiments of our rulers upon the currency of the nation. Had none but the State banks been involved in the ruin, I should not have regretted their fate. It would have seemed a most fit retribution for their subserviency to power. But every great interest of the country felt the shock. The commercial, manufacturing, agricultural, in its turn, and, most of all, the poor man, in his labor and its rewards.

Now comes the demonstration on the part of the Government—the proof of the proposition with which I started, viz: a settled hostility to the credit system with a view of enlarging Executive power, and perpetuating supremacy, by the union of the purse and sword.

The very men who seduced the banks from the line of duty, turn upon them, and urge that departure as a reason for their correction! No, for their destruction.

In the message of the 4th September, 1837, the President says:

"The history of trade in the United States for the last three or four years affords the most convincing evidence that our present condition is chiefly to be attributed to overaction in all the departments of business; an overaction, deriving, perhaps, its first impulse from antecedent causes, but stimulated to its destructive consequences by excessive issues of bank paper, and by other facilities for the acquisition and enlargement of credit At the commencement of the year 1834, the banking capital of the United States, including that of the national bank then existing, amounted to about two hundred millions of dollars; the bank notes then in circulation to about ninety-five millions; and the loans and discounts of the banks to three hundred and twenty-four millions. Between that time and the first of January, 1836, being the latest period to which accurate accounts have been received, our banking capital was increased to more than two hundred and fifty-one millions; our paper circulation to more than one hundred and forty millions, and the loans and discounts to more than four hundred and fifty-seven millions. To this vast increase are to be added the many millions of credit, acquired by means of foreign loans, contracted by the States and State institutions, and, above all, by the lavish accommodations extended by foreign dealers to our merchants."

Again he says: "The present and visible effects of these circumstances on the operations of the Government and on the industry of the people point out the objects which call for your immediate attention. They are, to regulate by law the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public moneys; to designate the funds to be received and paid by the Government; to enable the Treasury to meet promptly every demand upon it; to prescribe the terms of indulgence, and the mode of settlement to be adopted, as well in collecting from individuals the revenue that has accrued, as in withdrawing it from former depositories; and to devise and adopt such further measures within the constitutional competency of Congress as will be best calculated to revive the enterprise and promote the prosperity of the country.

"For the deposite, transfer, and disbursement of the revenue, national and State banks have always, with temporary and limited exceptions, been heretofore employed; but, although advocates of each system are still to be found, it is apparent that the events of the last few months have greatly augmented the desire, long existing among the people of the United States, to separate the fiscal operations of the Government from those o individuals or corporations.

"Again to create a National Bank, as a fiscal agent, would be to disregard the popular will, twice solemnly and unequivocally expressed. On no question of domestic policy is there stronger evidence that the sentiments of a large majority are deliberately fixed; and I cannot concur with those who think they see, in recent events, a proof that these sentiments are, or a reason that they should be, changed."

Again he says:

"In the mean time, it is our duty to provide all the remedies against a depreciated paper currency which the Constitution enables us to afford. The Treasury Department, on several former occasions, has suggested the propriety and importance of a uniform law concerning bankruptcies of corporations and other bankers. Through the instrumentality of such a law, a salutary check may doubtless be imposed on the issues of paper money, and an effectual remedy given to the citizen in a way at once equal in all parts of the Union, and fully authorized by the Constitution."

Passing the intermediate messages and Congressional action, with the mere remark that there was a sort of non-committalism about them that enabled partisans, where they judged it expedient, to urge that the President was not unfriendly to the credit system, and which delusion might have continued, but for his tour North during the summer of 1839, when the Simon Pures of the party compelled him to throw off all disguise, we come to the message of 2d December, 1839.

That this last paper is drawn with political tact I readily admit; but, with the exception of its candor in waging open war upon credit, I cannot say any thing in its commendation. In every other particular it is delusive and double faced. He says: "The financial operations of the Government during the present year have, I am happy to say, been very successful."

Is this so? What shall we say of the financial skill of those who, but four years since, found a nation out of debt, with millions of surplus on hand, and who, during the past year, have been compelled to resort to the credit of that nation to the amount of millions, in the shape of Treasury notes, in order to carry on the ordinary business of Government?

Speaking of the reduction of expenditure, he says:

"With a determination, so far as depends on me, to continue this reduction, I have directed the estimates for 1840 to be subjected to the severest scrutiny, and to be limited to the absolute requirements of the public service."

Speaking of the necessity of practising rigid economy, he says:

"With the Legislature rest the power and duty of so adjusting the public expenditure as to promote this end. By the provisions of the Constitution, it is only in consequence of appropriations made by law that money can be drawn from the Treasury. No instance has occurred since the establishment of the Government in which the Executive, though the component part of the legislative power, has interposed an objection to an appropriation bill on the sole ground of its extravagance. His duty in this respect has been considered fulfilled by requesting such appropriations only as the public services may be reasonably expected to require."

An independent legislator cannot but be struck with the powers here claimed for himself by the President, and ought to feel grateful that thus far he has forborne their exercise. He has not vetoed a law merely on the ground of its containing an extravagant appropriation. This certainly is kind and considerate towards the representatives of the people. But what part of the Constitution makes the President "a component part of the legislative power?" According to former readings, it has been supposed that the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial branches were not only separate and distinct, but were so designed to be; and that the power vested in the President of returning bills, with his objections stated, was a power given for self-protection, and not for interference with the policy or extravagance of appropriation—a shield to the Executive branch, and not a sword to be turned against the people—a weapon for defence, but not for attack.

Then the homily on economy comes to us with peculiar force and fitness, from the head of an Administration which has run up the expenses of the Government from an average of thirteen millions, in 1824-'8, to an average of thirty-seven millions, in 1839-'40.

But strip this part of the message of its diplomatic court language, and in plain English it means that the Legislature of the nation are bound to take the estimates of the President. Not to go beyond them at the peril of being branded as extravagant; not to fall short of them at the like peril of being denounced as factious. The Legislature keeping strictly within the prescribed limits, the machinery of Government may possibly be kept in motion through the present year without further loans.

But the national works must be arrested in an unfinished state—progress in the Cumberland road must cease—the improvement of the Hudson river stop—the mariner on your coast perish for want of light houses, and property and life be lost upon the lakes for want of harbors; and the bills now pressed upon us from the Departments, for the armed occupation of Florida, and for an additional military force for that unfortunate Territory must not pass, because the expenses to be incurred are not included in the estimates; or, if passed, those expenses are to be charged to legislative extravagance.

Speaking of the partial suspension of the banks in 1839, the President says:

"There was nothing in the condition of the country to endanger a well managed banking institution. Commerce was deranged by no foreign war; every branch of manufacturing industry was crowned with rich rewards; and the more than usual abundance of our harvests, after supplying our domestic wants, had left our granaries and storehouses filled with a surplus for exportation."

The suffering manufacturers and their thousands of workmen at Pittsburg, at Paterson, and at Lowell, must have felt this portion of the message as adding insult to their injuries.

Again the President says:

"The weight which presses upon a large portion of the people and the States, is an enormous debt, foreign and domestic. The foreign debt of our States, corporations, and men of business, can scarcely be less than two hundred millions of dollars, requiring more than ten millions of dollars a year to pay the interest."

This is strange language for a Republican President to use. What has he to do with the private affairs of individuals, or with the debt of New York? For my own State, I can say, she has the proud satisfaction of knowing that she was the pioneer in the great and beneficent work of internal improvement. Unaided and alone she has marched forward toward the completion of her own system, and unaided and alone she will keep her faith to creditors untarnished, and punctually meet all her engagements.

But, strange as is the language of the President, its object, to wit, to cripple the States, destroy their credit, and increase Executive power and patronage, will very plainly appear when I refer hereafter to the action taken on the suggestion of the message in another branch of the Legislature.

And such is the message of 1839, ingenuous in no particular save the one formerly mentioned by me, that is, its open hostility to the credit system of the country. And the bill before us is but a legislative enactment of the views of the message, and is equally free, with it, from any doubt as to its object, aim, and inevitable tendency.

I now come to the second part of my argument, as proposed to myself at the outset of my remarks—the attempt to assign some of the objections I have to this bill, and some of the reasons why I have thus far and shall continue to oppose it in all its stages.

And, first, the President says:

"From the result of inquiries made by the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to the practice among them, [other nations,] I am enabled to state that, in twenty-two out of twenty-seven foreign Governments, from which undoubted information has been obtained, the public moneys are kept in charge of public officers. This concurrence of opinion in favor of that system is perhaps as great as exists on any question of internal administration."

And the Secretary of the Treasury enumerates amongst those foreign Governments, Prussia, Austria, European and Asiatic Turkey, Cuba, &c.

Some of the despotic Governments enumerated by the Secretary have no banks, and, of course, must employ other agents to keep their funds; some of them are small Territories and Principalities, (scarcely larger than the towns of my own State,) easily overlooked and watched; and some of them are but just emerging from barbarism. With the exception of the system of education in Prussia—a system mainly dependent for its creation and existence upon the sagacity of a prince far in advance of his fellows—a Republican will look in vain through the list of States for any thing worthy his imitation.

The liberty of republican Turkey is not what the patriots of '76 fought and bled for, and acquired for their descendants and country. Nor do our people covet the institutions of Cuba, though it be the land of the bloodhound, that most efficient auxiliary of a Christian army, of a Christian Republic, in its war upon a miserable remnant of a once powerful race of savages. Besides, judging from present appearances, Cuba is in danger of running off the hard money track; for even there discussions are now going on in the Government paper at Havana, as to the expediency of adopting the banking system; and England and the United States are cited as examples of its eminent utility. Our rulers should took to this approach to liberty in Cuba ere it be too late.

II. The measure proposed must, in its operation, cripple, if not destroy, the banks of the country, and with them credit of all kinds. The President intends that the measure shall affect them. He says:

"In a country so commercial as ours, banks, in some form, will probably always exist; but this serves only to render it the more incumbent on us, notwithstanding the discouragements of the past, to strive in our respective stations to mitigate the evils they produce."

He seems here to be sensible that commerce requires credit.

Allow me to state the reason. I hold it as an axiom in political economy, "That no commercial nation can have a specie currency sufficient for its wants."

Its monetary and trading transactions cannot be represented in bullion.

The President assumes there may be in the country eighty-five millions of dollars in specie. I suppose there are not more than sixty millions. Well, what is a circulating medium but the means of representing the transfers of the wealth of production?

Production, in its various shapes, constitutes the wealth of a people. We produce vastly more than formerly, and yet this bill seeks to reduce the means of representing the transfer of that wealth of production, and it will do so. Who, then, will produce? What object to do so, beyond supplying the simplest wants of nature? Produce and you cannot sell; or, if so, at prices making it an object to produce for sale.

Much has been said at different times and in different State papers, about France being mainly a hard money Government.

Let us see, for a moment, what France—not as she was, clad in complete armor, and, like the Ishmaelite of old, warring with every brother, but as she is, disposed to cultivate the arts of peace, and convinced that, from her geographical position, soil, and climate, she is destined to take the highest rank amongst the commercial nations of the world, thinks of this matter.

The Journal des Debats of the 15th of November, 1839, says.

"At this time, commercial transactions absorb in France a capital of three milliards of francs, (six hundred millions of dollars,) in the unproductive form of specie. The Chambers will have to inquire how far, by means of a bank, to be in reality, by its faculties, the bank of all France, this unproductive capital can be gradually diminished, in order to apply part of it to more profitable purposes."

This bill, when in full operation to the vast extent of Government transactions, in imposts, land sales, and postage, receives and recognises nothing but specie. To the extent of these transactions, the Government takes the specie from the banks, thus crippling, if not ruining them; and it hoards it up, useless to every one.

III. The plan is expensive and unsafe. This is an old and very obvious objection, but can lose none of its force by repetition. The bill itself shows a large expenditure contemplated at the outset; what that expenditure may amount to in the end we may from past experience conjecture; and as to the other branch of the objection, the insecurity of the measure, argument would be thrown away (after the cases of Swartwout and Price, to say nothing of others,) in endeavoring to illustrate or strengthen it. I therefore content myself with merely alluding to it, in passing as briefly as possible over some of the prominent heads of the remaining part of my argument.

IV. It virtually creates a Government bank without the commercial benefits and facilities of a National Bank, organized upon the true basis. It is a bank of deposite, with the collector, receiver, postmaster, &c. A bank of issue with the Secretary of the Treasury, and may become, for aught I see, one of discount also. The Secretary may draw drafts, these will form a circulating medium better and cheaper than coin. The cheaper currency always replaces the dearer one. This is a law of trade. At any rate, it is to depend upon the Secretary of the Treasury how long the drafts may remain out, and, of course, how long circulate as money.

V. The threatened evil has already reduced property of all kinds; the bill in full operation will bring it still lower. The merchant has gone by the board already, and the manufacturer and mechanic are struggling for bare existence. The revenue is gone in anticipation, even. In the city of New York, where the President says, in his late message, fifteen millions dollars were received by the collector the present (then) year, but $300,000 of duties have been secured during the month of January, 1840. In January, 1839, $1,300,000 were secured; thus showing a falling off of one million in a single month.

The farmer, too, is now feeling the beginning of the end. Of what value to him are the smiles of Providence upon his crops? Can he sell them at living prices? The President, indeed, felicitates the country, as I have shown you, on its prosperity. But who else, either in or out of this Hall, with the facts of the day before him, has the hardihood thus to sport and laugh at the sufferings of an entire people? The language of the message, in reference to our prosperity, chills the blood as it would to see the physician stand over his patient, writhing in the agonies of death, smile in his face, and tell him he was getting well.

That there is universal derangement in business, and consequent distress, stand admitted by all, save the President; and it is curious to hear the various and warring reasons assigned for this distress by the political quacks and charlatans of the day. One says it is owing to the overtrading of the merchants and people; another attributes it to wild speculation; another to over-issues of the banks; but the solution of the whole difficulty has been given by three very wise men of my own State, the bank commissioners—men deriving their existence and political consequence from a system devised by the Executive of the Union, for the purpose of combining the monetary interests of my State with its party politics.

In their annual report, submitted to the Legislature of New York on the 24th January, 1840, they say:

"As no rise of prices was perceptible here during the suspension, so no fall was occasioned by the resumption, and the produce of the country went forward at very fair, if not large prices; and a large circulation of bank paper was sustained during the autumn of 1838 and the early part of the following year. The over-production induced by the high prices of preceding years was not at that time apparent, and had not produced its legitimate effect upon prices, which more recently has been severely felt. It is quite apparent now that prices have heretofore been too high, and quite fortunate for many who then complained of the want of money to purchase the produce of the country, that it was not more abundant; and equally fortunate, we think, for the banks, that the limit of their circulation was not enlarged at the last session, as some were desirous of having it."

Now if this were not too serious a matter for merriment, one might feel disposed to laugh to hear pretended financiers and political economists talking about universal distress upon the rich and poor, produced by an abundance of the necessaries of life. They tell the farmer (and I wish him to note it) "that prices have heretofore been too high." And to the farmers I would say, in reference to the avowal of the above sentiment, stand by and see your farms reduced in value by political action for partisan purposes, and then, if you can find it in your hearts to do so, lend your support to this class of politicians, for they claim to be the exclusive friends of the country and the people, and they intend evincing that friendship by the destruction of industry, and the value of every description of property.

Last, though not least, the poor man, the laborer, is destined to feel the operation of this bill in its blighting effects upon the price of his labor, and his ability to procure employment. That labor must come down in price is admitted. Senator Buchanan in his speech of 22d January, 1840, says:

"If, therefore, you should in some degree reduce the nominal price paid for labor, by reducing the amount of your bank issues within reasonable and safe limits, and establishing a metallic basis for your paper circulation, would this injure the laborer? Certainly not, because the price of all the necessaries and comforts of life are reduced in the same proportion, and he will be able to purchase more of them for one dollar in a sound state of the currency, than he could have done in the days of extravagant expansion for a dollar and a quarter."

The poor man is to get the wages of France, Sweden, Bavaria, Belgium, Germany, Netherlands, Italy, and Saxony; that is to say, an average of about 5*d* per day, and generally without board. Do tea, sugar, coffee, and foreign fabrics come down to our hard-money currency? No; we must buy and sell by the foreign standard. And, of course, the poor man must perform (if he can get any one to employ him) at least twice the amount of labor he now does to enable him to purchase a foreign article. But who is to employ the laboring man? What inducement will be left to invest capital in merchandise, in manufacturing, or building? The whole argument may be stated in the case of a son of the Emerald Isle. He came to market in New York, and wanted to buy a chicken. The price was 25 cents. Pat said he could get as good a chicken in Ireland for 6 pence. The owner very naturally said, "Then why do you not return to Ireland?" "Is it return you would have me? Arrah! when I get there, who will give me employment by which to earn the 6 pence?"

Who can, in this general stagnation of life and business, be benefited? The rich man, who owes nothing, and the office-holder, receiving his fixed salary, and selling his gold at a premium.

VI, and lastly. This bill unites in the Executive the purse and the sword. It will increase fearfully the already overshadowing power of that department. That power must be circumscribed, or it needs no prophet to predict the fate of our institutions. The danger from the Executive power was most forcibly depicted in 1826, in a report submitted to the other branch of the National Legislature.

In that report Colonel Benton says:

"The committee are of opinion that it is expedient to diminish, or to regulate by law, the Executive patronage of the Federal Government, whenever the same can be done consistently with the provisions of the Constitution, and without impairing the proper efficiency of the Government."

Again: "The committee rest their opinion on the ground that the exercise of great patronage in the hands of one man has a constant tendency to sully the purity of our institutions, and to endanger the liberties of the country."

Again: "The scene shifts from this imaginary region, where laws execute themselves, to the theatre of real life, wherein they are executed by civil and military officers, by armies and navies, by courts of justice, by the collection and disbursement of revenue, with all its train of salaries, jobs, and contracts; and in this aspect of the reality, we behold the working of the patronage, and discover the reason why so many stand ready, in any country, and in all ages, to flock to the standard of power, wheresoever and by whomsoever it may be raised." "The patronage of the Federal Government at the beginning was founded upon a revenue of two millions of dollars. It is now operating upon twenty-two millions; and, within the lifetime of many now living, must operate upon fifty. The whole revenue must, in a few years, be wholly applicable to subjects of patronage."

Speaking of the officers of the customs in the city of New York, the report says:

"A formidable list indeed!—formidable in numbers, and still more so from the vast amount of money in their hands. The action of such a body of men, supposing them to be animated by one spirit, must be tremendous in an election; and that they will be so animated is a proposition too plain to need demonstration. Power over a man's support has always been held and admitted to be power over his will."

Again: "We must, then, look forward to the time when the public revenue will be doubled; when the civil and military officers of the Federal Government will be quadrupled; when its influence over individuals will be multiplied to an indefinite extent; when the nomination of the President can carry any man through the Senate, and his recommendation can carry any measure through the two Houses of Congress; when the principle of public action will be open and avowed, the President wants my vote, and I want his patronage; I will vote as he wishes, and he will give me the office I wish for."

Again: "In the country for which the committee act, the press, with some exceptions, the Post Office, the armed force, and the appointing power are in the hands of the President, and the President himself is not in the hands of the people. The President may, and in the current of human affairs will be against the people; and, in his hands, the arbiters of human fate must be against them also. This will not do. The possibility of it must be avoided. The safety of the people is the 'supreme law;' and, to ensure that safety, those arbiters of human fate must change position, and take post on the side of the people."

If this were true in 1826, is it any less so now? Has any thing occured showing the General Government in its operations, to have changed its tendency and direction? The signs of the times cannot be mistaken. A sovereign State has been excluded from this floor. The President lectures the States upon their internal regulations; and, simultaneously, resolutions are introduced, and a report made, affecting their credit at home and abroad. This may be mere coincidence; but, to my mind, the coincidence is ominous. Pass this bill, and, in the effects claimed for it either by its friends or enemies, you give the Executive the power of controlling the monetary affairs of the country, the power of regulating State institutions, of dictating a course of policy for the States to pursue—the power, in fine, to destroy both individual and State credit. And when the resources of the individual and the State shall have been destroyed, the spirit humbled and crushed, whence are you to look for opposition to any Executive scheme? Who bold enough or able to oppose the appointment of a successor?

If the mushroom banks, the hot-bed growth of Federal patronage, have signally failed, as you were told they would by those who opposed their unnatural multiplication, leave them to the correction of public sentiment and State legislation. They will soon cease to have any power, either for good or for evil; whilst the sound and healthy institutions, having rode out the storm, will remain to meet the business wants of a commercial people.

To this House I say, rally once more to the rescue, and again defeat this Executive measure; and then, when the Administration, taught by the stern independence of this body, shall cease its warfare upon the great interests of the country, and return to the ways of our fathers, we may hope for something like repose—for a return, after years of suffering, to our former prosperity.

REMARKS OF MR. PORTER,

In Senate, April 21, 1840.—On the bill granting to the State of Michigan 100,000 acres of land to aid in the construction of a canal around the Falls of St. Mary's, Lake Superior.

MR. PORTER said he was not a little surprised at the manner in which this bill was received and treated in this debate. The grant it proposes to make has been spoken of by more than one Senator, on this and on former occasions when it has been before us, as one whose benefits are to inure to the State of Michigan only; as if this circumstance were of itself sufficient to enlist an opposition adequate to ensure its defeat. But is this so? The provisions of the bill are such as to deprive the State of all revenue from this canal, except for purposes of necessary repairs and attendance; and the United States are at all times to enjoy the free use of it as a highway, paying nothing even for these purposes. What, then, are the immediate benefits which are to result from the construction of this work? Will they not consist, in a great measure, in the extension of lake commerce? And does that belong exclusively to the State of Michigan? Where are the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, New York, and Pennsylvania, in this debate, that they do not claim an interest in this important improvement, and thus relieve this bill from the imputation of partiality and injustice which is sought to be fixed upon it, on account of its alleged identity with that of Michigan only?

As Michigan is to derive no revenue from this canal, and as she has no public domain to be enhanced in value by its construction, I know of no better mode of testing it as a measure of utility to all the States I have named than by an exhibit of the present interest they have in the commerce of the Northern lakes.

The aggregate American tonnage on these lakes, (including Ontario, which now communicates with the rest by means of the Welland canal,) in 1838, amounted to nearly 50,000; about 8,000 less only than that of the States of South Carolina and Georgia united. This tonnage is licensed and enrolled as follows:

			Tons	95ths.
At the ports in the State of New York,			22,338	26
Do	do	Pennsylvania	3,216	04
Do	do	Ohio,	13,770	15
Do	do	Michigan,	9,847	86
Making an aggregate of			49,172	36

There being no port of entry in either of the States of Indiana and Illinois, or in the Territory of Wisconsin, their present tonnage does not appear; but these powerful communities are yet in their infancy in ship-building, and the amount they contribute is as yet but inconsiderable. Who does not see, however, that in the benefits, present and prospective, that are to result from the making of this canal, Michigan is to be but a participator with her neighboring sister States, all brought in immediate contact with the trade that is to be opened by it? We are perpetually asked here for information as to the nature and extent of this trade—are told in advance that it must be unimportant and inconsiderable—that nothing is known of the country to which a navigable access is to be gained—and that this whole scheme is premature and visionary. We meet these objections by urging that the geographical position of this canal is sufficient in itself to demonstrate its importance to all these States, and indeed to the whole Union; that the largest of these great inland waters, having 1,500 to 2,000 miles of coast, is to be thrown open to their shipping at a trifling cost, (for this grant is but a trifle, after all, when the grandeur of the object is properly estimated;) we aver that there are now vessels on Lake Superior doing a profitable business in the fur trade and fisheries of that region; and, if the opinions I have heard expressed by gentlemen of the highest respectability and business intelligence are to be relied on, a lucrative employment in the fisheries would, by means of this communication, at once be given to all the sailing craft of these lakes, a large proportion of which is now idle at our wharves, owing to the temporary stagnation of lake commerce, and the recent use of steam vessels for the transportation of every species of merchandise.

If this information as to the extent of these fisheries be correct, (and that it is, I have no reason to doubt,) some estimate may be formed of the immediate results which would attend this improvement, not to Michigan only, but to all the States I have named—especially to the States of New York and Ohio, each of which has now resting on these waters its great canal, through which the products and acquisitions of commercial enterprise, gathered in this new and vast field of adventure, will pour their contributions to its internal revenues and to the wealth of its citizens. The white fisheries of Lake Superior are a matter of certainty, proved by actual discovery to be an important and valuable item of domestic export; and we are only in doubt as to the limit which is to bound it. Those of the Detroit and St. Clair rivers afford us no guide in ascertaining it, for there they are quite limited, never exceeding in amount $50,000 per annum, owing to the fact that the white fish are only taken during a short period in the year—some three or four weeks during the months of October and November. This is not the case, as I am informed, in respect to the fisheries of Lake Superior. These are never interrupted—not even during the season of frost; and this being the fact, it is difficult to imagine any limit to their amount.

The statistics of the northern fur trade, to which this new and broad expanse of navigation would be tributary, are not at hand; for the reason, probably, that the very obstruction which it is the object of this bill to overcome is one of the main impediments to competition in that valuable traffic. The fur trade of this whole continent is known to be chiefly in the hands of the two great American and British companies. Its history shows that it has been more or less absorbed by associations having large and extended facilities and capital, from the granting of the first charter by Charles the Second to Prince Rupert and his associates in 1670, down to the present day; and if these monopolies, in their direct intercourse and traffic with the Indian tribes, have at any time been successfully opposed by the bold spirit of enterprise of our northern adventurers, the opposition has been disarmed, when all other expedients have failed, by buying it up, and in many cases incorporating it on advantageous terms with the stock of some one of these great companies. Competition has thus been smothered, and the fur trade made the sure means of overgrown wealth to the monopolists who have controlled it. And why has this been so? It has been because the avenues leading to this trade have been beset with difficulties insurmountable by small capitalists; and when these difficulties have at last been overcome, and the pathway to competition opened by the creation of facilities of travel and transportation, this monopoly of the fur trade has ceased, and the companies have been compelled to pay to our enterprising merchants their profits on the original cost of the furs, or encounter them as competitors in the foreign market. In proof of this, it is only necessary to advert to the fact, that in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and the southern peninsula of Michigan, in each of which furs to a large amount are now annually collected, nearly all the company trading-posts have long since been broken up. They are now in the "terra incognita" of which the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. PRESTON) speaks, amassing the wealth which it will be one of the results of the passage of this bill to open, to a certain extent, to all our citizens. Mackinac and St. Mary's are the great northern depots and places of outfit of the American Fur Company, at which points the shipments of furs now amount annually to near two hundred thousand dollars, a large proportion of which are derived from the trade of Lake Superior.

I have alluded, sir, thus imperfectly, to the fur trade and fisheries of the north, for the purpose of showing that there are present objects of value and importance to be gained by this canal. But, sir, in a national point of view, I confess myself greatly surprised that this interesting work has failed to arrest the attention and command the approbation of every member of the Senate, who is not led by his constitutional opinions to repudiate all appropriations for objects of this character. The entire southern coast of Lake Superior is a boundary of the public domain of the United States, which, within this upper peninsula of Michigan, is estimated at about fourteen millions of acres. The geographical position of this vast tract of country is such that all communication with it must necessarily be by water. There are no other means of access to it. It is to all intents and purposes insulated. Without this canal, it cannot be brought into market, and consequently no motive will present itself for extinguishing the Indian title which now encumbers a large portion of it. The information we derive from tourists, who have visited that region, justifies us in the belief that it contains vast mineral resources, which, it is clear, can never be successfully developed until it can be rendered accessible by means of navigation. These considerations, together with others which have been adverted to in this debate, fully demonstrate to my humble apprehension the interesting character of this work as a national one.

But, sir, there are many distinguished Senators who do not view the subject in this light, and, in their zeal to create hostility to this grant, have introduced topics here, which it seems to me proceed from any thing but a spirit of liberality, and even of courtesy towards the State of Michigan. When we are asked for information as to the probable cost of this work, and we answer the call by pointing to a copy of an estimate on our tables, showing that, on the plan of its adaptation to ship navigation, it will fall short of 120,000 dollars, we are met by the rejoinder that its construction for this small sum is not within the range of probability. The estimate we present is scouted as unworthy of credit, and we are told that the grant we now ask is but the beginning of a drain on the public lands for an object about which the country neither knows nor cares. But a few years will elapse, says the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN,) and another one hundred thousand acres will be asked for to complete this canal. I confess, sir, that I feel not a little wounded that a motive inferrible from all this is imputed to us, and that the evidence we offer as to the probable cost of this canal is treated as wholly unworthy of confidence. Gentlemen cannot have well examined this paper, or they would assuredly have forborne to treat it thus unkindly. What is it, sir? It is the copy of a special message of the Governor of Michigan to the State Legislature, transmitting the estimate of the State engineer, on which estimate it was to act, and did act, in authorizing the opening of this canal as a State work, and in appropriating money for that object. The estimate was not made to be sent here for the purposes of the present reference, as the document on its face shows; and yet we are told it is not entitled to credit, because it was not made under the authority of the Federal Government; as if it were an indispensable part of the qualifications of a civil engineer that he should be certified, or commissioned, by your Topographical bureau; or that the State would, in the prosecution of her enlarged system of internal improvements, intrust the surveying and estimating a work like this, on which her own money alone was to be expended, to an engineer incompetent to a skilful performance of that duty. The very presumption is an absurdity; and, were it not so, my own acquaintance with the engineer, (Mr. Almy,) personally and professionally, would lead me to give the highest degree of credit to his estimates for works of this description, whether in Michigan or elsewhere.

It is insisted, sir, by the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CRITTENDEN,) that this grant is wholly inadequate to the making of this canal, and he endeavors to illustrate this assumption by comparing it with the Louisville and Portland canal, which cost nearly a million of dollars. With great deference to that distinguished Senator, I must be permitted to say this comparison is instituted without a full knowledge of the relative difficulties attending the making of these two canals.

The fall in the river at St. Mary's is 22 feet 10 inches, which it is proposed to overcome by three locks of equal lift. The length of the canal will be less than 5,000 feet through ground of even surface, and but slightly elevated above the river. The height of the water is always uniform, or nearly so—never being influenced by floods, and only subject to variation between extremes of 2 to 4 feet, occasioned by winds blowing either down or up Lake Superior. The depth of the canal would not require to be more than 12 to 14 feet from the top of the embankment; and the locks, each of less than 8 feet lift uniformly, would need no more than an ordinary depth of chamber. There is already a small canal around these falls, (opened by the military of Fort Brady in the common round of fatigue duty,) on which the Government has erected a sawmill. The opening of a navigable steamboat canal is the plainest thing imaginable, for there are only common obstacles to overcome, and no extraordinary changes produced by the elements to guard against. Such is not the fact in respect to the Louisville and Portland canal. By a document contained in the report of the Committee on Roads and Canals relative to this work, now on our tables, we are informed, among other things, that the rise and fall of the Ohio are such as to vary the depth of water in this canal from 4 to 40 feet! Why, sir, I will venture to say it has cost more money to build one of its three lift-locks, than it would require to make a ship-canal at St. Mary's, locks and all.

But, sir, the Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. PRESTON,) in his zealous and eloquent opposition to this bill, adopts a course of reasoning directly opposite to that of the Senator from Kentucky. He exclaims against this grant as a prodigal contribution of the national resources to a mere local object, and, in estimating its value, he assumes that, under the power the bill confers on the State of Michigan to select these 100,000 acres from among any of the unsold lands in the State, a portion of the public domain may be taken, capable of yielding to the Government perhaps a million of dollars. Sir, is not this assumption altogether fallacious when we refer to accounts of sales on our tables? By reference to a document now before me, I find that the aggregate sales of public lands by the United States, from 1833 to 30th September, 1839, inclusive, embracing as well those at auction as at private entry, amounted to 53,941,800.62 acres, and that the purchase money accruing thereon was $68,319,843 71—less than $1 27 per acre. The time has long since passed for the Government to realize for its lands any very considerable sum above the established minimum price. Should the State of Michigan succeed, by a wise and prudent management of this grant, in realizing from it a greater sum than would accrue on this rate of sales, it will be because of its increase in value, consequent on the application of her own unaided enterprise and resources.

I will not indulge, sir, in any course of invidious remark towards other new States to whom large grants of the public domain have been made for objects of internal improvement, in support of the just claim of Michigan alone on the liberality of Congress for this grant. It rests, in my judgment, on higher and broader considerations. Besides, sir, there is a bill now before us, which proposes a uniform and equal system in respect to such donations. When that shall come up for discussion, it will be a more suitable occasion to refer to the past in support of her distributive rights.

SPEECH OF MR. BELL,

OF TENNESSEE,

In the House of Representatives, April, 1840.—On his bill to secure the Freedom of Elections.

MR. SPEAKER: I cannot forbear congratulating myself upon the enjoyment of the unexpected privilege of speaking in explanation of the provisions of a bill which has been the subject of so much misrepresentation by its enemies, and no less misapprehension among those who, though friendly to the object of it, have never taken the trouble to examine it. I need not say that I take a deep personal interest in the success of a measure upon which I have bestowed so much reflection; but, unless its importance to the public interest and welfare can be made manifest, I am aware that it can never recommend itself to this House. To demonstrate the importance of some such measure as the one I have proposed, if we would preserve the free institutions of the country in their spirit and purity, will be the object of the remarks which I now propose to submit.

My judgment may have been misled by the ardor of my feelings, in coming to the conclusion that no free Government can last, where the abuses which this bill proposes to correct shall no longer excite complaint or remonstrance among the people. But such is my settled conviction; and with this impression constantly on my mind, my friends will excuse me for regarding this as by far the most interesting and important measure which can come before the present Congress. They will also, for the same reason, pardon me the tax I propose to impose upon their time and patience, in the somewhat elaborate examination I intend giving to a subject in which they may not have felt any particular concern. I invoke a patient hearing from all—from gentlemen on both sides of the House, and of all parties, who think with me that there is something wrong, radically wrong, in the practical operations of our political system, and who possess enough of patriotic feeling to seek an adequate remedy. To such I can promise that if they have confidence in the virtue and wisdom of the sages who have gone before us, they shall be rewarded for their attention; for it is they chiefly who, I intend, shall address them upon this subject.

But, before I proceed with my remarks upon the character and object of the bill, I feel called upon to notice the attempt which was made to strangle it in its birth. This must appear the more singular and extraordinary, when we reflect that the bill could not have been read or examined by any one member of the House; it had not been printed; it had not been read at the Clerk's table, before my colleague, (Mr. JOHNSON) rose and objected to its introduction. Another of my colleagues (Mr. ——) distinguished himself by his zeal and forwardness to get the bill rejected, before its provisions could be examined or understood. Not content with the opposition made to the motion for leave to bring in the bill, one of my colleagues thought it his duty to move the question of consideration. If he had succeeded in that movement, the bill would have been voted down by honorable members, more than three-fourths of whom cannot, even now, tell their constituents what are the provisions contained in it. The motion for leave was carried by a small majority, and I have to thank a few of the more liberal gentlemen who support the Administration for their courtesy in extending to me what had never before been denied to any member of the House—the privilege of introducing a bill!

But what could have been the prompting motive to the extraordinary course of my colleagues and others who sustained them? Far be it from me to impugn their motives; but still a rational curiosity may be indulged on this point. The bill does not propose to lay any tax, nor to appropriate any moneys, nor to create an office, nor to increase the salary of one already created; and as to the actual provisions of it, they will be found, on inquiry, to have been framed with special care to avoid the infringement of any constitutional right or privilege; and, besides, it would have been in the power of the House to modify and amend it by striking out every thing that might appear, upon examination, to conflict with any sound principle. It is impossible to dive into the thoughts of honorable members, but there was something so remarkable in their movements in relation to this bill, that we must be allowed to wander a little into the regions of conjecture as to their motives and designs.

It may be that many honorable gentlemen, impressed with feelings of distrust and alarm, by the exaggerated descriptions they had heard of the arbitrary and unconstitutional provisions of the bill introduced into the Senate at the last session of Congress by a gentleman of distinguished worth and eminence from Kentucky, and learning from rumor that my bill was similar in its provisions and objects, felt bound to resist it at every stage of its progress. I can readily understand how gentlemen of very upright intentions may have acted under the impression that they were resisting the introduction of another odious gag law, so gross have been the misrepresentations current in the country in regard to the bill of the Senate.

But still it is strange that so large a number of the gentlemen of this House should recoil at the idea of a gag law, and particularly gentlemen who belong to the majority. A gag law unpopular here! Why, it is the favorite argument of power at all times. A gag law out of favor in this House! Why it is notoriously the favorite weapon of the majority, especially in all critical and nicely balanced questions. Why, sir, gag law may be said to be personified in this House. How often have I heard the half-suppressed and despondent exclamations of the opponents of some arbitrary proceeding, upon observing the gentleman who, by association, in his own person combines all the terrors of the gag, advancing down the aisle to his well known stand, there to catch the Speaker's eye, and carry into execution its inexorable decree, by moving the previous question! Of all places in the civilized world, a gag law ought to find most favor in this House, judging from its own practices of late. But my colleagues! how can they, especially after the practical illustration they have given of the use of the gag, utter one word against it before the people, without a blush of shame upon their cheek? How can they, after showing themselves so apt to practise it—such adepts in its application to the business of this House—return to their constituents, and declaim against a gag law? Is it not extraordinary that gentlemen who claim to be the advocates of the unrestricted right of speech should, at the very instant of time at which they set up this pretension, furnish so signal an instance of the violation of their own principles? But my colleagues may have had a very different object in view, in attempting to have this bill thrown out, without consideration or debate. They have doubtless a distinct recollection, together with a very high estimate of the advantages they derived, during the canvass of the last summer, from gross and scandalous misrepresentations of the nature and objects of the late bill of the Senate. If my bill had been rejected under circumstances affording plausible grounds for similar misconstruction and perversions among the people, it would have secured to them equal advantages in the political campaign of the next summer and fall; it would have told admirably for their purposes to have had it to say that my bill was of so atrocious a nature, that the House of Representatives rejected it as unfit even for consideration! What a fruitful subject for the artful and unrestrained declaimer before the people!

While the yeas and nays were calling over upon the motion for leave to introduce the bill, my imagination was busy in sketching an outline of the figure it was likely to make in the ensuing canvass in Tennessee, if the motion should be lost. I also amused myself in conjecturing the terms in which I might expect to be gazetted next morning in the columns of the official journal, (the Globe.) And, although the contingency did not arise, which then appeared by no means improbable, yet the sketch I then drew was so much in character with the editorials of that journal, and so true a likeness of the many misrepresentations of my course and principles to be found in that newspaper and others in the same service, that I cannot forbear presenting it to the House. I am still of opinion that, had my motion miscarried, I should have read in the Globe of the next morning an editorial nearly in these words:

"That notorious Federalist and deserter from the Democratic ranks, (JOHN BELL of Tennessee,) had the audacity, yesterday, to ask leave of the House to introduce a second edition of the alien and sedition law of 1798; but the prompt and vigilant spirit of Democracy, ever on the alert to guard the interests of the people, met this dangerous and daring attempt to destroy the freedom of speech and of the press in the threshold; and saved the House of Representatives the deep degradation of having its calendar polluted with a measure so odious and despotic. We congratulate the country upon the auspicious fact that a majority of the House of Representatives was found so faithful to their trust as to refuse even to consider a proposition so utterly inconsistent with every principle of the true Jeffersonian creed, to which it is the honor and glory of our party to adhere with the most rigid and inflexible consistency. Proof more convincing and damning cannot be adduced of the fell and unalterable purpose of the whole Federal Whig and Abolition party, should they once get into power, not to suffer one vestige of the rights and liberties of the people to remain, than the renewal of that abominable scheme of putting a gag into the mouth of every freeman in the land, in order to screen themselves from the indignation and punishment with their nefarious principles and designs so richly merit, and which will be sure to be visited upon their heads if the people are permitted to speak and to act unrestrained by the fear of legal pains and penalties."

Those gentlemen in the House who profess to be Democrats, and consider themselves to be the exclusive guardians and keepers of the sacred fire of liberty, have, with a few exceptions, done all that was in their power to stigmatize me upon the journals of the House as the author of a proposition so unreasonable and monstrous in its nature as to shock the feelings, and to justify the violation of all courtesy, both parliamentary and personal. In doing this, they have given me carte blanche—the amplest range both of attack and defence, in speaking of their public principles and conduct, consistent with the order and decorum of parliamentary discussion. They will therefore excuse me if I avail myself of my privilege; which, indeed, I mean to do.

Proceeding with all due caution and delicacy, I mean to tear off the mask of Democracy and Republicanism assumed by the opponents of this measure, both in and out of the House. I perceive that a number of gentlemen who claim to belong to the State Rights school have also ranged themselves under the banner of unqualified hostility to every measure of this kind. I propose, also, to draw aside the thin veil with which they have sought to cover over their bald Federal and consolidating practices. The whole class of pseudo Democrats and Republicans who have signalized their zeal against the principles of this bill, I shall attempt to prove have wholly departed from the ancient landmarks of the Republican party. These gentlemen profess to be Jeffersonians—to be the followers of Jefferson. They the followers of Jefferson! What a profanation of the name and principles of Jefferson! If they mean to say that Jefferson was a hollow hearted demagogue, with the praises of Democracy and sound principles ever upon his lips, but a perfect contempt for them always in his heart and practices, employing the terms merely as catchwords and clap-traps to delude and mislead the credulous and ignorant, then may they have some pretence to be called the followers of Jefferson. But, sir, I will take care to establish that those gentlemen who claim to be leaders of the Republican or Democratic party, in opposing the principles of this bill, have abandoned some of the most essential and vital principles in the creed of the great founder of their party, by authorities so conclusive and irresistible that the vote which they gave against it shall stick to them like the fabled shirt of Nessus, for the balance of their lives; and whenever in their future career they shall claim to have lived up to the law and kept the faith as true Republican statesmen, even after every other stain upon their political escutcheon shall have been washed out, this one, like the blood upon Lady Macbeth's hands, will remain; and their foes shall still have it in their power to say, "Yet here's a spot!"

I now proceed to explain the object and provisions of the bill.

The main scope and design of the measure, as will be made manifest as I proceed, are, to reduce, to cut down, the alarming and still increasing power and influence of the Executive branch of the Government; a power and influence already so enormous as to threaten a consolidation of all the powers of Government in a single head.

The power of the Executive has been increased and rendered formidable of late, chiefly through the abuse of the appointing power; the right asserted by the President and the heads of Departments, of removing subordinate officers to subserve party purposes; and the interference of public officers in elections.

This bill looks to the accomplishment of its object chiefly by the increased protection and security it proposes to throw around the elective franchise, with a view to protect its purity, its independence, and efficiency, as the true panacea of the Constitution.

When we investigate closely the elements of the different forms of government, we shall find that the elective franchise constitutes the distinguishing feature of the free representative form; and it is, at the same time, its vital principle. It is the precious inheritance of every free-born citizen of this land, and the high privilege of those only besides, whom the Constitution and laws allow to participate in its exercise, after due probation of their sincerity and capacity to understand its use and appreciate its value. To preserve it, free and incorrupt, must then be the first care of every Republican statesman. I hold that the preservation of the integrity and independence of the elective franchise is not less important than the preservation of the right itself; as we value and would cherish the right, so should we take care to protect it against every influence which is calculated to undermine its purity or destroy its freedom. It is the precious coin of civil liberty, current only in free States; and, like the gold and silver coin of commerce, its value is just in proportion to its exemption from all debasing infusions and admixtures. Why, then, should it be thought less important to guard and protect this vital principle of our Government by penal sanctions, than the subordinate interest and instrument of trade—the current coin?

We hear much declamation about the freedom of speech and of the press, whenever a law is proposed to secure the ballot box against the improper intrusion and interference of public officers. But why are the rights of speech and the freedom of the press held sacred? What is their chief value in a free Government when properly considered, if it be not to ensure the pure, enlightened, and independent exercise of the elective franchise? He who would tamper with this sacred and invaluable right among the people—he who would deliberately seek to bring the patronage and influence of official station in conflict with its freedom, would not hesitate to invade the right itself, if a favorable occasion should be presented; and he who would do either, whatever he may profess, is at heart a foe to the liberty and free institutions of his country.

Now, as to the provisions of the bill. The first clause of the preamble is the most important part of the whole bill. Inde if the principle therein stated shall be established or admitted to be sound, in the administration and practice of the Government, the remaining provisions may be dispensed with; they will then become comparatively useless. The clause in question is merely declaratory of a principle, and in these words:

"Whereas complaints are made that officers of the United States, or persons holding offices or employments under the authority of the same, other than the heads of the chief Executive Departments, or such officers as stand in the relation of constitutional advisers of the President, have been removed from office or dismissed from their employment upon political grounds, or for opinion's sake; and whereas such a practice is manifestly a violation of the freedom of elections; an attack upon the public liberty, and a high misdemeanor."

If it be inquired why I do not propose to provide against the violation of the principle asserted in this clause of the preamble by penal sanctions, I answer that, so far as regards the President, (and he, after all, must ever be held mainly responsible for the abuse of the appointing and removing power,) I conceive we have not the constitutional authority to punish him for any violation of the duties of his station, in any other form than by impeachment—the mode prescribed by the Constitution. I will not interrupt the main argument by going further into the reasons for limiting our action on this point to a simple declaration of the principle, "that it is a high misdemeanor to remove a public officer to promote the interests of party." I shall feel quite well assured that no President or head of a Department will venture upon so gross an abuse of his high trust, if it shall once be solemnly settled by a vote of Congress that it is an impeachable offence. I have, in this bill, proposed the only mode of redress for this abuse which appears to me to be open to us—except the moving an impeachment for some act of wanton removal already perpetrated—which I might do upon the most solid grounds of fact and principle, but in which I know I could not be sustained by this House or by the Senate.

I have promised my State Rights friends on both sides of the House, who have taken ground against this bill, to show them, as in a glass, how they must stand in all future time when measured by the true Republican standard. As to the Democrats of the modern school, I do not conceive that any valuable purpose can be effected by satisfying them of the extent of their departure from the faith which they profess.

Then as to this power of removal by the President, with or without cause; whence it is derived? In what clause of the Constitution do you find it expressly given, or in what grant of an express power do you find this one given by implication? Sir, have you, as a member of the State Rights school, ever been able to point out the clause from which you can derive it, according to the principles of construction by which you profess to be guided? I am sure you never have. But it is almost as difficult to derive it from any clause of the Constitution whatever, by any implication not evidently forced, and going beyond the less restrictive rules of construction adopted by the Federal school of politicians. Neither Mr. Hamilton nor Mr. Jefferson, the antipodes of each other in their mode of giving effect to the Constitution, could agree that the President was authorized by his sole authority to remove a public officer for any cause whatever. In fact, the power exists no where in the Constitution; it is the mere creature of construction and practice; it stands even upon worse grounds than these—it is a construction and practice adopted in the very teeth of a clear and satisfactory implication forbidding its exercise. The fourth section of the second article of the Constitution provides a particular form of proceeding for the removal and punishment of the President and all other civil officers, superior and subordinate.

"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

Now, sir, according to that sound and well known rule of construction, so applicable to written constitutions as well as to all other compacts and agreements, "the expression of an affirmative concludes a negative, or, as in this case, the appointment of a particular mode of affecting an object implies a negation of all other modes of doing the same thing, the President is, by this clause of the Constitution, prohibited from removing any civil officer, for any cause whatever. A stronger implication cannot be shewn than that which arises from this clause against the power of removal by the President, so far as civil officers are concerned. The prohibition is rendered more manifest by the omission to include military officers, who were left to be removed by the President, as commander-in-chief of the army and navy.

But I have gone into this argument for no other purpose than to show my State Rights friends, and all others who call themselves Republicans, how far, very far, they have strayed from their principles, in opposing this bill—to expose the hollow declamation which we every day hear in this Hall and out of it, on the dangers of Federalism, which, in the continued exercise of implied powers, would draw every thing in the sphere of Federal control; on the danger of consolidation from the increasing power and influence of the central Government. It is time these professions should cease, or that those who make them should be compelled to carry them out in their practice. If they really mean to restore the Constitution, by healing the breaches which have been made in it, by the exercise of implied powers, they should begin by denying this power of removal to the President. When they think proper hereafter to declaim upon the necessity of bringing the vessel of State back to the "Republican tack;" on the importance of adhering to a strict construction of the Constitution; when they denounce a bank and internal improvements and the assumption of State debts as unconstitutional, because the power over those subjects is derived by implication, merely, I trust, for the sake of a decent regard for consistency and candor, they will hereafter denounce the power of removal by the President as equally unconstitutional; nay, as doing greater violence to their rules of construction than all of them put together. That this power has been assumed upon the slightest of all possible implications, none will deny. This is clear from the debate which took place when it was first claimed. The question arose in 1789, upon a clause of the bill to establish the Treasury Department, which provided that the President should have power to remove the Secretary. Mr. Madison, the leading champion for the power, it is clear from his whole argument, took his ground without the slightest reflection upon the dangerous nature of the precedent he was laboring to establish, as throwing the door wide open to the exercise of implied powers. Two years later he would not have committed this error, as is evident enough from the course he took upon the bank question. The danger from that source did not, however, escape the attention of some of the ablest members of that Congress, and it is evident, from many passages of the debate, that, but for the popularity and unbounded confidence reposed in the integrity and patriotism of General Washington, this power never would have been conceded by Congress. But he was then President, and it was but little short of treason against the Republic to oppose any power proposed to be vested in him. This power was not, then, derived from any particular clause in the Constitution. Mr. Madison thought it might be derived from the general grant of Executive power to the President; he contended that it was a necessary incident to the Department which superintended the execution of the laws, and that the removal of a public officer was, in its nature, an Executive act; but it was replied, with greater force of reason, in my opinion, that the act of removing a public officer was not more Executive in its nature than the appointment of one; nor was the power of removal more essential in the execution of the laws than the power of appointment, and that the Constitution had provided an advisory council in the exercise of the appointing power; and if the power of removal was a necessary incident to either of the grants of power relied upon by Mr. Madison, it could only be exercised with the advice and consent of the Senate.

But, Mr. Speaker, my bill does not propose to go to the length of declaring the removal of a public officer by the sole authority of the President to be unconstitutional; it does not propose to disturb the decision of the first Congress on this subject. It leaves that question where it now stands. But it does propose to declare the wanton exercise of this power; it does propose to declare that the removal of subordinate officers, not made with a view to secure the faithful execution of the laws, but to subserve party interest, is an abuse of this power, and one that deserves punishment by impeachment. Strange to say, however, I find some of my State Rights or Republican friends warring with me on this point also. They are not only willing to concede the power of removal by the President alone, but they will not interpose to check the abuse of it.

Before I proceed to inquire whether it is, in fact, an abuse of this power of removal to displace an honest and competent public servant because he will not support the Administration, a preliminary fact may be required to be established. Does such a practice exist? Do the President and heads of Departments make removals on any such grounds? One would suppose, after all that has transpired here; after all that has been proclaimed to the world through so many channels, with regard to this practice, that no one could have the hardihood to deny the existence of it. Yet there are those in particular sections of the country who do deny it, affirming, with a shameful and reckless audacity, that this charge against the Administration is false and libellous. I have often heard it asserted on this floor that there were upwards of a thousand officers removed under the late Administration without fault alleged or proved against them. That several hundreds have been so removed under the late and present Administrations—enough to intimidate the remainder, or make them good liege men, I risk nothing in affirming. The many living monuments we meet in this city, of the proscriptive and partisan principles on which removals have been and continue to be made, in every section of the country, are too numerous to admit a doubt on this subject. In particular instances the proofs have been laid before the world. The proceedings of this House and of the Senate contain the evidence that some of the Departments have been called upon to disclose the grounds upon which they have removed certain officers, but they have generally either refused or evaded the call. But need I dwell upon this point? Are not removals made almost under our own observation? Do we not receive almost daily information that some faithful postmaster, or other officer, has been thrown out of employment, to make way for some more pliant instrument of party? Is not the case of the late postmaster in this city an instance of the wanton exercise of this power? I might affirm the same thing of the late postmasters at Baltimore and at Albany. The practice has become so notorious that all disguise may soon be expected to be thrown off. No disguise is now practised in many of the States. It is already thrown off in this House. It was thrown off in the Senate several years ago by a Senator from New York, (Governor Marcy,) but never until the last session of Congress had any member the courage to justify this practice in open debate on this floor. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRARY] was that man! But that gentleman was not the first man filling a high public station who openly advocated this dangerous and infamous abuse of power. That distinction belongs to the President, (Mr. Van Buren.) After diligent inquiry, I find that the correspondence which took place in 1832, between Mr. Van Buren and others, with the Postmaster General, in relation to the appointment of a postmaster at Albany, contains the first public and unequivocal approval of the spoils principle, or the practice of removing public officers upon party grounds, to be found in the whole range of our political history. There may be found the germ of that system of party administration which has brought this great country, and every interest belonging to it, to the very verge of disorganization and destruction. It is in this correspondence, likewise, we find the recorded evidence of the early adoption of that system of party tactics by Mr. Van Buren, to which he has steadily adhered ever since, as the most infallible mode of acquiring and preserving power. How far he may have mistaken the character and genius of the people of this country, yet remains to be seen. The first direct and open effort to subdue the independence of the Post Office Department, and to bring it within the pale of party organization, is also to be found in this correspondence.

Let us now see what the sages of past times, and the founders of our Constitution, thought upon this subject of the removal of faithful and competent public officers. The opinion of Mr. Madison will surely be admitted to carry with it the very highest authority of any man, living or dead, upon this question. If any man, who has ever made a figure in the civil history of this country, deserves to be regarded as a model statesman, it was James Madison. What he might be expected to say of the maxim openly vindicated and insisted upon by the leaders of modern Democracy, we may infer from what he said in the debate upon the question of the power of removal in 1789. He then declared the wanton and causeless removal of a public officer to be so improbable and monstrous that he could not regard its occurrence as possible. But let him speak in his own language:

"What will be the motive which the President can feel for such an abuse of his power? and what the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeached by this House, before the Senate, for such an act of mal-administration [all I wish to establish;] for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust. But what must be his motive for displacing a worthy man? It must be that he may fill the place with an unworthy creature of his own. Can he accomplish his end? No, he can place no man in the vacancy whom the Senate shall not approve."

Alas! what a dream. What a mistaken estimate of the Senate—of Senatorial purity and independence! But Mr. Madison, with all his wisdom, could not look into futurity. He would have abandoned all hope of human society, if he could have foreseen a Senate composed chiefly of members who were themselves but the creatures of the President!

But Mr. Madison expresses himself with still greater force upon this subject in another part of his argument. After adverting to the control which the two Houses of the British Parliament had frequently exercised in the appointment and removal of Ministers by the King, an hereditary monarch possessed of high prerogatives, and so many other sources of influence, Mr. Madison exclaims:

"Can we suppose a President elected for four years only, dependent upon the popular voice, impeachable by the Legislature, little, if at all, distinguished for wealth, nor deriving much personal weight or influence from the Department of which he is the head—I say, will he bid defiance to all those considerations, and wantonly dismiss a meritorious and virtuous officer? Such an abuse of power exceeds my conception. If any thing takes place, in the ordinary course of business, of this kind, my imagination cannot extend to it on any ratio at principle."

Such were the sentiments and opinions of James Madison on this subject; and who will say that the principle he avows is not sound, statesmanlike, and Republican?

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that the illustrious names of Washington and Jefferson have been quoted in opposition to the doctrine of Madison upon this point; but I will demonstrate, before I close, that their expressed and recorded sentiments do not conflict with his upon this all-important and fundamental principle in a Republic. It would be impossible they should entertain a different sentiment, consistently with their known patriotism and devotion to the cause of free Government.

The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CRARY,] in his speech at the last session, claimed the example and authority of Washington in favor of the proscriptive and anti Republican practice of the present Administration. The tenor of that speech, as delivered in the House, was throughout a vindication of the practice of removing public officers for opinion's sake; but when it was prepared for the public journals, the author shrank from a plain and unequivocal avowal of the doctrines his speech was intended to support. In his printed speech he imputed to me an argument I never employed. He assumed for his premises what I had furnished him with no pretext for, and then proceeded gravely to combat a proposition I had never asserted. I never contended that the President, or any other officer invested with the appointing power, might not, with propriety, give his political friends the preference in appointments to office, when they were equally competent and trustworthy. That is a privilege which every sensible man will concede at once. In combating this shadow of his own conjuring up, the gentleman quoted the well-known and often-repeated sentiment of Washington, which is in these words:

"I shall not, while I have the honor to administer the Government, bring any man into any office of consequence, knowingly, whose political tenets are adverse to the measures which the General Government is pursuing; for this, in my opinion, would be a sort of political suicide; that it would embarrass its movements is certain."

This is the doctrine upon which the gentleman says Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe practised. Admit it: what then? Will that prove that it is no abuse of power to remove an officer already appointed, who minds his business, and performs the duties of his office faithfully, because he cannot support the President in all his views or measures, and refuses to interfere in carrying the elections for the Administration? General Washington declares, not that he will remove any man from office whose political tenets are adverse to his, but that he will appoint no such man to any office of consequence. It was only offices of great weight and consequence that he would take care to fill with his own political friends. His great, pure, and magnanimous mind scorned the narrow, corrupting, and miserable policy that would inquire the politics of an applicant for a petty clerkship. But this was his course in making appointments only. Removals upon party or political grounds, as in the case of Madison, exceeded the conception of such a man as Washington. These were the doctrines and practices of the founder of our system.

But what were the doctrines and practices of the great reformer of it—the Great Apostle of Liberty, as he is sometimes styled by sterling Republicans, and always by the leaders of modern Democracy? We shall see.

On the 7th of March, 1801, three days after his first inauguration as President of the United States, Mr. Jefferson wrote to Mr. Monroe on the subject of making his appointments, and employed this language:

"I have given, and will give, only to Republicans, under existing circumstances. But I believe, with others, that deprivation of office, if made on political grounds alone, would revolt our new converts, and give a body to leaders who now stand alone. Some, I know, must be made. They must be as few as possible, done gradually, and bottomed on some malversation or inherent disqualification."

On the 22d of the same month he wrote to Mr. Giles on the subject of the principle upon which he proposed to conduct his administration, and particularly as to "appointments and disappointments to offices," saying:

"Some principles have been the subject of conversation, [in the Cabinet,] but not of determination; e. g. 1. All appointments to civil office during pleasure, made after the result of the election was certainly known, to Mr. Adams, are considered as nullities. * * * Mr. Adams's best friends have agreed that this is right. 2. Officers who have been guilty of official misconduct are proper subjects of removal. 3. Good men, to whom there is no objection but a difference of political principle, practised on only as far as the right of a private citizen will justify, are not proper subjects of removal, except in the case of attorneys and marshals."

On the 29th of the same month (March) he wrote to Samuel Adams, (of Republican memory,) and expressed himself on the subject of removals in this language:

"The storm is over, and we now in port. The ship [State] was not rigged for the service she was put on. We will show the smoothness of her motions on the Republican tack. I hope we shall once more see harmony restored among our citizens, and an entire oblivion of past feuds. I will sacrifice every every but principle to procure it. A few examples of justice on officers who have perverted their functions to the oppression of their fellow-citizens must, in justice to those citizens, be made. But opinion, and the just maintenance of it, shall never be a crime in my view, or bring injury on the individual. Those whose misconduct in office ought to have produced their removal, even by my predecessor, must not be protected by the delicacy due only to honest men."

This last was followed up by one of the same date to Elbridge Gerry, in which we find these equally explicit and noble sentiments.

"Officers who have been guilty of gross abuses of office, such as marshals packing juries, &c. I shall now remove, as my predecessor ought in justice to have done. The instances will be few, and governed by strict rule. The right of opinion shall suffer no invasion from me. Those who have acted well have nothing to fear, however they may have differed from me in opinion."

To the doctrines of these extracts, regarding them as an outline of the policy of Mr. Jefferson's Administration upon the subject of appointments and removals, except the exclusion of attorneys and marshals from the pale of his mercy, as indicated in his letter to Mr. Giles, there can be no objection. But this exception will be found to be more apparent than real; for he afterwards qualifies it, by stating, as a reason for their removal, and a very substantial one it was too, that the course of justice had been obstructed by them in packing juries, &c.

I come now to notice another letter of Mr. Jefferson, written in the month of July, 1801, and which has been very much quoted and relied upon to show that he changed the opinions he entertained upon the subject of removals from office upon his first accession to power, or that he at least violated them in his practice. I allude to his letter to a committee of the merchants of New Haven, who had sent him a strong remontrance against the removal of Mr. Goodrich, collector of that port. Let us see whether the doctrines of this letter do really conflict with those contained in the extracts already referred to from other letters. Mr. Goodrich had been appointed near the close of Mr. Adams's administration, and Mr. Jefferson had, upon coming into office, announced his intention to consider all such appointments as "nullities." In this letter he puts the question directly to the committee, whether the appointment of another person as the successor to the former incumbent could, under the circumstances, "be candidly considered a removal of Mr. Goodrich?" It is clear that this case belonged to a peculiar class, and which, to say the least of it, afforded some more reason for the exercise of the power of removal than a mere difference of political opinion. Yet Mr. Jefferson re-asserts, substantially, in the very next sentence, his former expressed opinion. For, says he:

"If a due participation of office is a matter of right, how are vacancies to be obtained? Those by death are few, by resignation none. Can any other mode than that of removal be proposed? This is a painful office. But it is made my duty, and I meet it as such. I proceed in the operation with deliberation and inquiry, that it may injure the best men least, and effect the purpose of justice and public utility with the least private distress; that it may be thrown as much as possible on delinquency, on oppression, on intolerance, and anti-revolutionary adherence to our enemy."

In the same letter, Mr. Jefferson laments, in a strain of unaffected regret, a state of things which would compel him to exercise the power of removal in order to let in the Republican party to a due participation of the public offices. Their "total exclusion under the preceding Administration," he said called for "correction" at his hands.

"I shall correct the procedure," he continues, "but, that done, return with joy to that state of things when the only question concerning a candidate shall be, is he honest? Is he capable? Is he faithful to the Constitution?"

It is impossible to deny that these are patriotic, worthy, and noble sentiments. And if there is in this letter a shade of departure from the principles he had before avowed his determination to be governed by in the exercise of the power of removal, I have it in my power to show that he was driven to declare it, and to act upon it, by the clamorous importunities of that forward, hungry, and voracious swarm, which, vulture like, hangs upon the skirts and constantly besets every triumphant party; by that hyena pack, which does not cease, by day nor by night, to howl round the Treasury, demanding to be admitted to the spoils, and taking no denial; by that same class of unprincipled camp-followers, who, I infer from the frequent appeals I observe in the Metropolis and the Globe, continue to haunt and importune the President at this day, not to relax in the work of proscription until every officer, high and low, shall be driven out of employment, who does not, or will not, join in the shout of applause, and give that support to his Administration which it is their boast to do. These cormorants, calling themselves Jeffersonians as they do, contrary to all he ever said or did, would deny any participation in the public offices to their opponents; they concede no such right; total exclusion alone will satisfy them. While a Whig remains in office, their cry will still be—

"Kill, burn, destroy, let not a traitor live!"

For those who slew the tyrant Cæsar were traitors to their country in the eyes of the illustrious predecessors—the great prototypes of our modern Democrats. But to the proof. A few days after the letter was written to the New Haven committee, we find Mr. Jefferson unburdening his mind to his friend, Levi Lincoln, in the following language:

"That the Republicans would consent to the continuation of every thing in Federal hands, was not to be expected, because neither just nor politic. On me, the first Republican President, was to devolve the office of executioner—that of lopping off. I cannot say that it has worked harder than I expected. You know the moderation of our views in this business, and that we all concurred in them. We determined to proceed with deliberation. This produced impatience with the Republicans, and a belief that we meant to do nothing. Some occasion of public explanation was eagerly desired, when the New Haven remonstrance afforded us that occasion. The answer was meant as an explanation to our friends. It has, we hear, every where, had the most wholesome effect."

The truth appears to have been, that Mr. Jefferson was censured by some of the more intolerant, restless, and office-loving of his own party; and he yielded a reluctant acquiescence in a more rigorous course than his own judgment approved, though not absolutely at variance with his avowed principles.

[Mr. ADAMS rose and asked Mr. B. if he had ever read another letter to Levi Lincoln, in which Mr. Jefferson declared his determination to remove Mr. Jackson. He asked Mr. BELL's attention to that letter.]

I have an impression, resumed Mr. B. that I have read such a letter, but do not remember any thing inconsistent with what I have stated on the subject of Mr. Jefferson's opinions.

[Mr. ADAMS said it would be found that Mr. J. removed Mr. Jackson from office without any pretext except a difference of political opinion.]

Mr. B. resumed. I have turned to the letter alluded to, and the passage in relation to this subject I find I had marked for reference. It is in these words:

"We are proceeding gradually in the regeneration of offices, and introducing Republicans to some share of them. I do not know that it will be pushed further than was settled before you went away, except as to Essex men. I understand that Jackson is a very determined one, though, in private life, amiable and honorable. But amiable monarchists are not safe subjects of republican confidence."

It is evident, from this letter, that Mr. Jefferson persuaded himself at least, that he was not departing from his avowed principles in displacing Mr. Jackson. By taking the ground that Mr. Jackson was a monarchist, Mr. J. showed his opinion of the soundness of his former principles, and sought to distinguish the case of the "Essex men" from all others in which there was merely a difference of political sentiments. He had written to Mr. Macon in a former letter that he had directed the Postmaster General to employ "no printer, foreigner, or Revolutionary tory in any of his offices." He adds, in the case of Jackson, to this list of disqualified persons, monarchists.

[Mr. ADAMS said Mr. Jackson was not only a person of great private worth, but as pure and sound a Republican in principle and feeling as any man in the United States. His differing with men about the policy of the Government, or the proper construction of the Constitution, made him neither tory nor monarchist. The truth was, Mr. Jefferson regarded every man as a tory or monarchist who was opposed to him; and he had removed Mr. Jackson for no other reason.]

Mr. B. resumed. I should be sorry to be understood as affirming that Mr. Jackson was either a tory or a monarchist. I do not doubt that he was fully entitled to the character given him by the gentleman from Massachusetts; but, whether he was the one thing or the other, does not affect my argument. I would fain hope, for the sake of principle, and that the country may have the full weight and influence of the name of Jefferson in settling this power of removal upon correct grounds, that he was sincere, and really believed Mr. Jackson to be a monarchist. But, if it was otherwise, I contend that the necessity Mr. Jefferson felt himself under of assigning some other cause for the removal of Mr. Jackson than an ordinary difference of political opinion showed what his principles were, and that he was ashamed to depart from them in that case. If Mr. Jefferson did violate his own principles, in this respect alone he may bear some resemblance to his professed followers of the present day—the modern Democrats; and in that they may truly be regarded as his disciples.

Mr. Jefferson's violations of his own principles must be set down to his infirmity as a man. Unfortunate, indeed, would it be for the country, and for society itself, if no principle is to be regarded as sound which was ever violated by those who professed it. Mr. Jefferson has undoubtedly left for the guidance and instruction of his countrymen the purest and soundest principles applicable to this subject. I regret, on the public account, that there exists the slightest reason to suppose that he was not entirely sincere in his professions; and it is manifest, from the fact that his correspondence, in which his principles on this subject are so clearly set forth, was published by his express direction, that he continued to regard them as sound to the close of his life.

I now propose to come down to our own times for some further confirmation of the doctrines of my bill. There are but few of the leaders of both parties in this country, at this time, who do not remember something about a famous resolution introduced into this House by General Saunders, member from North Carolina: the same who still figures in the politics of his State. The resolution proposed to draw from the Secretary of State (Mr. Clay) his reason for taking away the printing of the laws from some two or three printers of newspapers, and bestowing the job upon certain other conductors of public journals. That resolution had the support of the whole opposition to Mr. Adams's administration; so jealous was the Jackson (now Democratic) party of the independence, not only of public officers, but of the Government employees of every kind! Alas! sir, for the wreck of principle since that time. But I refer to that proceeding now principally with the view to quote from the speech of the mover of the resolution what he said upon the subject of removals for opinion's sake. The passage I rely upon is in these words:

"The different gentlemen who have opposed this resolution have all placed it upon the ground that the printers of the laws were neither officers for life nor good behavior, but were appointed at the discretion of the Secretary of State, and liable to be changed at his pleasure. Now, sir, it required no great sagacity to have made the discovery, as no one could believe it competent for the Secretary of State, bold and daring as he is, to remove a man from office conferred upon him by the constitutional authorities. It may suit the present policy of the Executive to confer appointments, yet they can hardly undertake to vacate an office."

So, sir, we see that, as late as 1827, no member of any party in this country ever imagined that the time would come when the practice of removing public officers, on political grounds, would be openly proclaimed and justified. But I might refer to higher authority than General Saunders, and a late one also. The late Administration is known to have come into power as the reform and anti-proscription party; and the first inaugural address of General Jackson begins with these solemn an imposing words:

"Public sentiment has inscribed," &c.

But I need not quote it at length—the boys of the country will know what I mean. The conclusion of the paragraph, however, being now directly in point, I will read, which is in these words:

"And particularly the correction of those abuses which have disturbed the rightful course of appointments, and continued important public trusts in unfaithful or incompetent hands."

In what manner General Jackson proceeded in the correction of those abuses which had been committed by the appointing and removing power under Mr. Adams's administration, I will not now undertake to point out, nor will I inquire whether the unprecedented number of removals which took place under the late Administration, were made wantonly, for a difference of political opinion, or for better cause, nor whether, with or without any good cause, General Jackson was privy or consenting thereto, whether he was the wilful or the involuntary dupe of the artful knaves and flatterers who beset him, or whether, in fact, he changed his opinion, as some of his friends allege, after he was in power a short time, as to what would or would not be an abuse of the appointing and removing power. I leave all these questions for others to discuss and decide. It is enough for my present purpose to have shown that, when General Jackson came into power, the removal of a public officer or the retaining one in office, to subserve party purposes, was regarded as a gross abuse, which required correction.

A colleague of mine said the other day, that he had of late heard scarcely any thing else in Tennessee but the cry of proscription, extravagance, patronage—a reduction of Executive patronage! If my colleague will carry his thoughts back to the period of the administration of the gentleman who sits near me, [Mr. ADAMS,] he may find some cause for solemn reflection upon the strange vicissitudes which occur in human affairs. When struggling for power, the party with which my colleague is now associated, were the pursuers. They filled the whole country with their clamors about extravagance, proscription, abuse of patronage, and unlicensed corruption in the Administration, thereby deluding tens of thousands, old and young, including often the intelligent as well as the ignorant. Now they are in turn pursued; and when they are assailed with the cry of extravagance, proscription, and corruption, they complain of persecution! when, for twelve millions of expenditures under Mr Adams's administration, they have expended their annual thirty millions; when, for one act of unlicensed corruption under his rule, they number their hundreds; when, for one man removed or proscribed under Mr. Adams's administration, they have proscribed their thousand!

As to the constitutional power of the President to remove a subordinate officer for a difference of political opinion, I will say no more than simply to ask gentlemen to recur again to that clause of the Constitution which provides that all civil officers may be removed from office upon conviction for "treason, felony, and other high crimes and misdemeanors;" and, after they have done so, to put the question to themselves, whether any thing can be more supremely absurd, and even ridiculous, than this provision in the Constitution, if the President was, by the same instrument, vested with the power, by his sole authority, not only to remove for "treason, felony, and other high crimes and misdemeanors," but for no reason at all—without any default whatsoever in the officer!! The object of this clause in the Constitution was, undoubtedly, in the first place, to provide for the removal of public officers who had disqualified themselves for the public service by their crimes, or the abuse or gross neglect of their trusts; and, secondly, to throw around the civil officer the same protection and security, in the enjoyment of their rights, privileges, and emoluments, but, above all, their good name, against all tyrannical and arbitrary invasions or restrictions that the Constitution and laws, both of the State and of the Federal Governments, are so careful to maintain and protect in the private citizen. The genius and spirit of our whole scheme and system of civil liberty are directly opposed to the discretionary and arbitrary control which the President claims and exercises over the public officers.

There is one pretext which I have sometimes heard advanced for the exercise of this power of removal, without any default on the part of the displaced officer, which deserves to be noticed and exposed, not so much for the absence of plausible reasons to support it, as for the hypocritical and mischievous use made of it. I allude to the principle of rotation in office. There is no man of observation in the whole country, I venture to assert, who is so credulous as to believe that a single removal has ever been made on that ground; nor is it probable that one ever will be made for that reason. A great and decisive objection to this principle is, that it would add greatly to the power and influence of the Executive, without benefiting the public in the slightest degree; for, whatever might in any case be the secret, selfish, or even wicked object of removal, the pretext alleged to the public would ever be "rotation in office;" and thus the Executive would be able to reward his friends and punish his enemies without any of the odium which attaches to the removal of a faithful and able officer.

Time and the compass of a speech will not allow me to dwell longer upon this branch of the subject. I have already exhausted my strength, and I fear the patience of the House. I have dwelt thus long upon that provision of the bill which proposes a remedy for the abuse of the removing power, because, as I have already stated, I regard it as by far the most important part of it. The subject has been a favorite one with me for years. I look upon the abuse which I propose to remedy by this clause of the bill as the most crying and enormous that exists in the country. The correction of it I believe to be the first and greatest reform demanded by the exigencies of the times; by the mass of evils which exists in the land; by the opprobrium and degradation under which our system of Government suffers. Neither the question of a Sub-Treasury nor of a bank, nor any question of peace or of war ever likely to arise, is of so great importance. Because, sir, this discretionary power of removal, exercised upon political and party grounds, is the prolific source of every other abuse which exists in the public service.

It enters into and pervades every department of the Government; it strikes at the very foundation of all fidelity and efficiency in the public functionaries; it fills the public offices with faithless and incompetent incumbents, and expels from employment the honest and capable.

It paralyzes the energy and efficiency of the army and navy, by the introduction of a system of favoritism which destroys all honorable emulation and hope of preferment by gallantry and good conduct.

It has been the source of all the Indian wars with which the country has been afflicted and the Treasury exhausted within the last ten years.

It has been the source of all the shameful abuses, frauds, and corruptions known to exist in the sale and disposition of the public lands.

It has been the source of the still greater frauds, if possible, which have abounded of late in the department of Indian Affairs.

It has been the source of the unprecedented defalcations and plunderings of the public Treasury which have reflected disgrace upon the national character within the last few years.

Sir, we may long continue to investigate these abuses in this House, and denounce the authors of them to the public in the language of fierce and unqualified invective; but they must and will continue to abound as long as the detestable maxim, that places of trust and profit belong not to the most capable in office, but at the polls, is permitted to stand unrebuked.

If ever it shall become the settled doctrine that the President may rightfully, and with impunity, remove the smallest and most inconsiderable civil officer, because he will not support his measures, or sustain his re-election, it will be the most fatal stab which can be given to the spirit of freedom in this country.

If such a doctrine shall ever find advocates to justify it successfully before the people, then I affirm there will be no longer any security in the Constitution for the liberties of the country. Any bold bad man at the head of the Government—a man possessing tolerable ability, may defy the corrective of the ballot-box. He will be able to perpetuate power in himself and his appointees forever.

What will be the value of the boasted power of the ballot box if the Executive may so use his enormous patronage as to paralyze the action of the people at the polls?

What will the doctrine of strict construction and State rights be worth—what will it avail the advocates of those rights, if, after they shall have put down all appropriations for internal improvements, established the theory that a protective tariff and a National Bank are unconstitutional—what securities, I repeat, will these triumphs afford them, if, after all, the country may be destined to groan under a system of heavy taxation; oppressive tariffs, to support large armies and navies, raised to maintain the authority of a dictator, under the disguise of a constitutional President, over a prostrate, oppressed, and suffering people?

Sir, the liberties and welfare of the people of this country are not, and never will be, so much jeoparded by the exercise of implied powers as from the abuse of admitted ones—the power of raising armies, the power of making war, and, above all, the power of appointing to a hundred thousand lucrative employments, and the further power of making this host of incumbents subservient to Executive will, through the assumed power of removal for disobedience of orders!

I repeat, sir, that there is more danger to be apprehended from the exercise of this apparently small and inconsiderable power of removing a subordinate officer at discretion, than from the exercise of all the implied powers ever contended for by the most extravagant latitudinarian or ultra Federalist!

This evil, like the slow and insidious disease which preys upon the human system, unobserved even by the patient himself until his vitals are assailed, is, I fear, destined to be fully developed to public view when it will be too late to provide a remedy. So deeply, so strongly, do I feel upon this subject—so firmly rooted are my convictions—that I will not, I cannot, regard this or any other Government as free while such a power is permitted in a single Executive chief. Such a Government is obliged, in the necessary and inevitable course of things, to terminate in a despotism, upheld either by corruption or the sword! Wherever the entire patronage of a Government—of all its official establishments, is at the disposal of one man, there the whole power of the State centres in the same hands; the voice that issues from the ballot box is then but the echo of his own. All past experience, all history, speaks with the same voice on this question.

A reform of this great and growing evil must take place sooner or later, or this Government cannot stand and be free!

I come now, sir, to explain the second branch of the remedy proposed by the bill under consideration; and one, in every way, of subordinate importance to the first; for if the abuse complained of in the exercise of the appointing and removing power shall be corrected, there will be no necessity for penal enactments to suppress the abuse I am now about to bring to your notice, it will be found to be but a consequence of the first.

The second section of the bill provides:

"That no officer, agent, or contractor, or other person holding any office or employment of trust or profit, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, shall, by the contribution of money or any valuable thing, or by the use of the franking privilege, or the abuse of any other official privilege, or function, or by threats or menaces, or in any other manner, intermeddle in the election of any member or members of either House of Congress, or of the President and Vice President," &c.

I am aware that great prejudices have been excited in many sections of the Union against any measure of this nature, by the zeal and industry by which the bill of the Senate of last year was misrepresented and denounced. Nor can it be denied that the wording of that bill was unfortunate; for while the spirit and object of it were perfectly defensible and of easy explanation, yet its details were at the same time liable to some exception, and afforded plausible grounds for attacks upon it before the people; and attacked it was, sir, in the most furious spirit of party warfare. It was the theme of perpetual and unrestrained denunciation. It was declared to be more odious and infamous than the alien and sedition laws. It was declared to be the forerunner of a train of measures which would renew the reign of terror, and revive all the enormities of the black cockade period of 1798! The people were actually induced, in many instances, to believe that they were to have a gag put into their own mouths, as well as the public officers.

The description of the offence proposed to be punished by my bill was copied word for word, from a bill of a similar nature introduced by me three years ago; and I ask a candid examination of it. I request it to be brought to the strictest test of constitutional principle, of reason, and sound policy.

The contribution of money, or other valuable thing, by public officers, for the purpose of influencing or controlling elections, is the interference first enumerated, and proposed to be prohibited by law. Is there, or can there be, any just exception to this proposition? Is it fit that any portion of the salaries paid to the public officers, out of the common treasure, shall be given to corrupt the ballot-box, and to carry elections in favor of a party? Some are hardly enough to deny that such a practice prevails; then the prohibition of it can do no injury, while the very denial of the charge shows a prevailing sense, among many, of the enormity of such a practice.

The next species of interference proposed to be punished is the use of the franking privilege, which implies necessarily an abuse of it. Who will dare to find fault with this part of the bill? or who will, or who dare, justify an abuse of this or any other official privilege or function, by a public officer, in order to influence or control an election? I think I may safely leave this provision without further remark; nor need I dwell upon the prohibition of "threats and menaces," as a means of influencing elections. No one not wholly insensible to the value of independence and integrity in elections, can find fault with so much of the bill.

But I propose to punish any public officer who shall in any other manner intermeddle in elections. Let us see if there exist any plausible grounds of objection to this prohibition.

Intermeddle is a technical term. All the most learned lexicographers agree in its definition. It is clear and unequivocal. It is also a term in common and popular use, and is well understood among the people. It means, in the connection in which it appears in the bill, an officious interference; taking an active part; busying one's self; a going out of one's way; taking part or engaging in the business of electioneering. The prohibition proposes no restraint upon the free expression of political sentiment, or of preferences for candidates, in one's usual and customary walk and intercourse with society. The right of suffrage is expressly admitted by the bill, as indeed it could not be taken away by it. Now, I ask, what exception can be taken to this measure, in reason or upon principle?

I have heard it objected that there are some thousands of deputy postmasters, and other officers under the Government, whose compensation is so small that they can have but little temptation to interfere in elections, and, therefore, any penal enactments against that class would be equally vexatious and useless. My observation of the course of appointment lately pursued in the Post Office Department satisfies me that these officers, as well as those of a higher grade, are selected from among the most heated partisans, whenever there are any such at or near the point where the office is situated; and, when appointed, they immediately become the most active agents of the party in elections, especially in distributing electioneering matter in behalf of the Administration candidates; and the interest and excitement by which they are governed lead them often to suppress or withhold from circulation all matter of a counteracting tendency. But to conciliate the support of others to the support of this provision of the bill, I would have no objection to limit its operation to all officers or agents whose fixed salaries or usual rates of compensation exceed two hundred dollars.

It was but a few years ago, Mr. Speaker, that it was strenuously denied by the official organ of the Administration, (the Globe,) that the President had ever interfered in elections. Nay, the charge was pronounced false and calumnious; and, at the same time, the public were informed that he [General Jackson] disapproved of the interference of public officers in elections. But now, sir, I am no longer under the necessity of referring to the proof of the habitual practice, in this respect, of the public officers generally, from the highest to the lowest. The practice is now become not only notorious, but it has been justified and vindicated by an authority no less respectable than the Senate of the United States! The report of Mr. WALL has become the text book of the Administration upon this subject. The doctrine that it is not only the privilege of public officers to interfere, but that it is their duty to do so, has become a cardinal point in their creed, and will continue to be carried out in practice as long as they shall remain in the ascendant. It must now be regarded as the settled doctrine of modern Democracy! Still the leaders of this powerful association claim to be the followers of Jefferson! Yet that great Republican statesman held the interference of public officers in elections so great an offence, that he pledged himself, before his election to the Presidency, that he would consider it "good cause of removal from office;" and, to his eternal honor, be it understood, that soon after his entrance upon his high trust, he issued a circular to the heads of Departments, interdicting the practice, and directing them to notify all the officers under their control of his order upon that subject. But it is useless to dwell upon these contradictions. It is become too well known to require to be exposed here, that it is the name of Jefferson, not his doctrines, which the gentlemen in power regard as most valuable in the accomplishment of their purposes.

Regarding the doctrine settled, that the officers of the Government may, without censure, interfere in elections, what, it may be inquired, are those monstrous evils which make the practice so criminal in the eyes of those who are in the habit of denouncing it?

All the irregularities and abuses proposed to be reformed by this bill are so regarded because they tend to increase the power and influence of the Executive in such a degree as to deprive the Legislative department of its due weight in the Government, and, finally, to set aside the power of the people themselves. The particular abuse under consideration, besides strengthening the Executive power, leads to the neglect and mismanagement of the public interest confided to the public officers, by diverting their attention to the business of electioneering.

One striking and inevitable result of this practice, sanctioned as it is by the whole party in power, will be to erect the entire corps of public officers, as soon as they can be properly drilled and disciplined, into a Grand Committee of the Union, for the management of all elections, of which the chairman will be the President of the United States! It is a committee organized to their hand by the Constitution and laws, but perverted to the worst and most unconstitutional purposes. To their official duties they have only to superadd the duty of making such provision in money, and taking such active measures besides, as will secure the success of their candidates in all elections; thereby perpetuating their own power, and securing a monopoly to themselves and their favorites of all the public offices.

It will be seen at a glance that this will be the most perfect system of party organization in the wit of man to devise. It is at this moment in full and active operation. Orders and instructions regularly go forth from the Central Sub Committee, with the President at its head, to its different members in every section of the Union. We can see clearly enough why it was that, without the slightest fault in the late postmasters at Albany, Baltimore, and in this city, they were thrust out of office, and decided partisans of the Administration put into their places. These were important points to be fortified. The public post was and is to be rendered subservient to party interests in the ensuing contest; and the fiat has gone forth for that purpose! I do not say that all the public officers are members of this grand committee. There are a few of some weight and consequence who have not yet been brought to yield implicit obedience to the President; but of the class of influential officers in the civil service liable to removal, I know of very few, while I am aware that there are several thousands, of inferior grade and importance, chiefly deputy postmasters, who have not become the slaves of party tyranny.

What, in truth, Mr. Speaker, are the hundred thousand office-holders, or recipients of Government favor in some shape or other, likely to become under the corrupting maxims and practices of the Administration? What are most of them at this moment, but so many feed attorneys, whose principal business and duty it is to advocate and support, at all times and upon all occasions, the measures and policy of the Administration, right or wrong, and to press the claims of their candidates in all elections? And, what is still more objectionable, they are paid from a Treasury replenished out of the substance and hard earnings of the whole people—of both parties!

Sir, how are we to meet this outrage? How are we to repress this increasing and daring mischief? It is denied that we the constitutional power to restrain public officers in the way proposed by this bill.

The late bill of the Senate was compared to the alien and sedition laws of 1798, and represented as having the same general object in view, and founded on the same principles; but how false and unfounded this view of the subject was, may be discovered at a glance by any individual of general intelligence and observation; and the body of the people must soon become sensible of the same thing. The two measures are as opposite as the poles in object and principle. The alien and sedition laws were designed as a restraint upon the free expression of opinion, by the people themselves, against the public officers and their measures. The bill of the Senate, and the one now under consideration, propose to prohibit the office holders from exercising an undue and improper influence over the people. The alien and sedition laws were intended to protect the public officers from the sayings and doings of the people; these bills propose to protect and guard the people against the sayings and doings of the public officers. In the one case, it was the alleged improper conduct of the people that was proposed to be punished; in the other it is the alleged improper conduct of the public officers that is intended to be prohibited. The tendency of one measure was to favor power, of the other to preserve liberty; and the true friends of liberty every where will soon learn to make the proper distinction.

The proposition to punish office holders for interfering in elections has been denounced as a measure comparable in enormity and tyranny only to the Spanish Inquisition! Here, again, the acute perception of the people of this country will soon learn to detect the absurdity of comparing this measure to that tyrannical institution. I have always understood, sir, that the hierarchy of the Romish church established the Inquisition for the restraint and punishment of the lay members (the people) who dared to intermeddle with matters of Christian faith; and also of such refractory priest or member of the hierarchy itself, who should dare to question the orthodoxy of their principles or the purity of their practices. If I have not, then, mistaken the object of that odious instrument of religious tyranny, there is no analogy, no resemblance whatever, between it and this bill. On the contrary, it will be found that there is a most striking and remarkable likeness between this Administration, its principles and practices, and the upholders and patrons of that infamous tribunal in Spain. Both profess to be orthodox in their creed, and claim that they alone are othodox—the one in religion, and the other in politics. Both denounce all who oppose them, either in faith or practice, as heretics and apostates: and both pursue those who dare to think for themselves with inexorable proscription! But with what reason or propriety can it be said that a bill which proposes to restrain the impertinent intermeddling of the high priests of the political church in the elections instituted to control them, is like a Spanish Inquisition? It is expressly designed to defeat and counteract a practice established by an insolent and selfish body of magistrates and office holders for the purpose of maintaining their power by official corruption and intimidation.

In the report of Mr. Wall of the Senate, another objection is stated, very like the one I have just noticed. It was contended that the bill of the Senate would give rise to an odious class of vexatious and infamous informers and spies upon the office holders. Take it for granted that such would have been the result of the Senate's bill; could any description of informers have sprung up under the operation of that bill more odious and infamous than the swarm of spies upon the public officers and public men of every class, which for years past has afflicted this country? If what I have said is not so well known among the people, they have at least felt the full measure of the evil in the blighted interests and prosperity of the country; and the wretches who live, gratify their bad passions, and get employment by the arts of the informer, are not known, because their information is given in secret, considered in secret, and promulged only in appointments to and removals from office. But this system of espionage is not confined to the office holders only; the conduct, the language, and in many instances the very looks of men, both in public and private, have been noted by these miscreants, either with a view to expel them from employment, or bring down upon them the displeasure of the President and his myrmidon followers. In fact, if any one desires to see exhibited the practices of the Spanish Inquisition, in matters of State and party politics, let him seek admission into the appointing and removing offices of the present Administration of this free Government!

Let us see now how widely different, both in principle and in its results, would be the practice of informers under the law prohibiting the intermeddling of public officers with elections. From the very nature of the case, every thing they do is open and public—the charge, the proof, and the decision upon it. The informer stakes his character upon the truth of his information; and a jury of the countrymen of the accused sit upon upon the charge in open day, and deliver their verdict under the sanction of a Federal judge. I know I need not say another word in answer to this objection.

But it is said, that to provide for the punishment of a public officer for intermeddling with elections would deprive him of of rights and privileges secured to him by the Constitution; which, in this case, would be to say and do just what he pleases in elections, provided he discharges the duties of his office properly and faithfully. The argument is, first, that the Constitution will allow no restraint on the office holder in abridging any privilege to which, as a citizen, he would have been entitled. Yet we have restrained their privileges, in repeated instances, by laws still standing on our statute books; as, for instance, in the laws relating to the establishment of the Treasury Department, and prescribing the duties of the officers employed in it. In these laws it will be found that Congress has exercised the power to prohibit them from the exercise of any of those rights and privileges of a citizen which would interfere with the faithful discharge of their official duties. And can there be a greater inducement for a warm political partisan to neglect or violate his trust, than the privilege of taking an active part in elections? In truth, it is one of the greatest temptations that can be placed in his path; so great that we know many, very many, have not been able to withstand it. The people of this country never can be reconciled to the idea that we cannot pass laws to make office holders mind their own business, and meddle not in things which necessarily disqualify them for the offices they hold. These reasons will apply with increased weight to the large class of officers in the employment of the Post Office Department. And especially, if the principle of Jefferson be well founded—if it be good cause of removal from office for a public officer to intermeddle in elections, what principle of reason or common sense forbids Congress to enforce the observance of it by law?

But it is objected that this bill proposes to reduce the large and respectable portion of our citizens who fill the public offices to the condition of serfs—of slaves; to deprive them of the privilege of speech, and that freedom of action which the Constitution secures to every citizen! I am astonished at the cool impudence—the bold disingenuousness of this argument, considering the source from whence it comes. Who are they who put it forward, and gravely ask the people to consider it? The very men who openly maintain and justify the doctrine that the President may and ought to remove every one of those free citizens from office who will not or does not give his cordial support to the President, his measures, and policy! It is this debasing, corrupting, and proscriptive policy—the policy upheld by these objectors—that would reduce the free born citizens who fill the public offices to the condition of servility which no high-minded and spirited man can or will endure. None but such as are fit to be slaves will ere long be found in the public offices under this system. Instead of oppressing or tyrannizing over the public officers, this bill proposes to strike the manacles from their hands—to set them free! When they shall be placed, by the permission of the Executive, upon that footing of independence and freedom of which it is said this bill will deprive them, there will be no necessity for the remedy which I propose. It is precisely because those who hold the power in their hands will not permit the public officers to think and act as they please in elections, that I propose that Congress shall interpose in their behalf. The voluntary interference of public officers in elections, their free and unbiassed intermeddling will never be an object of alarm or apprehension to the friends of the Constitution. It is the involuntary—it is the constrained interference of public officers in behalf of power that is to be feared, and requires a corrective. Let the whole field of politics be opened to them; let them take sides at their option, free from the apprehension of proscription and removal; and let them be selected upon those free principles, and we may safely rely upon their patriotism and spirit in maintaining the Constitution and the true interests of the country. But, sir, according to the admitted and notorious practice of the party now unfortunately in power, does not every man who takes employment under the Government sign, seal, and deliver an indenture of abject political servitude during his continuance in office? It is a condition of their appointment and continuance in office that they shall only speak or act in politics according to order! Yet it is from the supporters and advocates of a policy—a practice so repugnant in all its consequences to the spirit of freedom and independence—that we hear the objection to this bill that it will deprive the office holders of the privilege of speech and action which is secured to them by the Constitution!

It is, sir, to secure to the office holders these invaluable privileges, that this bill is designed. The most perfect freedom in the exercise of the elective franchise, of the right of speech and of the press, is what I most desire to see permanently established. That is undoubtedly what the framers of the Constitution contemplated, and what they supposed they had succeeded in securing upon the most durable foundation. But the interest and ambition of men in power have defeated the design of the Constitution in this respect; and this bill is intended to restore the freedom thus trenched upon by the Executive branch of the Government; and so entirely unfounded do I regard this objection, that I would be willing to insert a proviso to the section under consideration, that nothing therein contained should be so construed as to violate the right of speech and of the press, as secured by the Constitution. Sir, I would fearlessly leave it to the Judiciary to give all the effect to this section which I design it shall have, subject to such a proviso.

To the third section of the bill, I take it for granted there can be no serious objection. It is intended to provide an adequate punishment for a class of offences which cannot become very large until the standard of public morals shall be reduced very low, and the country, under the operation of the mercenary maxim by which the appointing and removing power is now regulated, shall be prepared for submission to any form of government which those at the head of the Administration shall think proper to establish. It is designed, in the first place, to punish bribery and corruption in the exercise of the appointing power, by the higher officers of the Government. This is an offence which, by the Constitution, may be punished by impeachment. Without doubt that would be the more appropriate remedy; but it has been manifest for many years past, that we have created an Executive with powers and patronage so vast and extensive, as to set the impeaching power at defiance. We have no resort in bringing the great officers of the Government to punishment for high crimes and misdemeanors, but in the independence of the Judiciary. It was to supply the place of this provision of the Constitution, rendered abortive by the preponderating influence of the Executive, that this section was added to the bill. The necessity of it was suggested to me by having my attention called to appointments given to some, and the promise of appointments held out to others, under such circumstances as left no doubt of the corrupt motive.

But, sir, there is another practice, which, whether originating with the Administration or not, has grown up under its auspices to such an indecent height as, in my opinion, demands a prompt and adequate remedy at our hands. It is the direct, palpable, and notorious bribe held out by the Executive to every man of talent and influence in the country, to enlist in the service of the Administration, or, if in its ranks already, to take a leading and prominent part in its support. I allude to the rich rewards which have been bestowed upon defeated candidates for popular suffrage on the side of the Administration, in so many cases, that there can be no mistake as to the policy or motive to such a course. I have repeatedly declared in assemblies of the people, that the President had, in effect, by a public proclamation, made "known to all whom it might concern," that no man of weight, of character and influence, who has it in his power to render any important service to the Administration, by becoming a candidate in any election, shall make any sacrifice of time or business for which he will not be amply rewarded. I now, in my place on this floor, make the same statement. This policy is now well known and understood. It may be regarded as a general maxim of the President, "whom the people reject, I will elect." If a gentleman is induced to sacrifice his professional or other prospects to become the candidate of the Administration in any important election, and is defeated, he is sure to be amply compensated by an office or employment of equal, and probably of far greater value by the President, than the one he failed to get from the people!

What is this practice, sir, when systematically pursued, but sowing corruption broadcast through the land? How many candidates for the office of Governor in the States, for seats in Congress in particular and contested districts, have, upon their defeat, been rewarded by more profitable, and, in many instances, by higher stations? How many worn out hacks of the party—gentlemen who entered public life with some character, but lost it in a long service marked by a servile submission to the will and behests of power—have been rescued from the resentment of the people—that just penalty of violated trusts—by the sustaining hand of the President? Is this practice in accordance with Democratic or Republican principles? Is this an orthodox method of giving effect to the will of the people, or of sustaining their sovereignty? If it be so, sir, it is, I affirm, wholly of modern invention.

But this abuse is not limited to the giving of offices and employments to defeated candidates only. Many instances have occurred in which the interests of party have been consulted at the expense of public principle and the public service, by conferring lucrative employments upon rival candidates for the same station, that there might be no division in the Administration ranks! A most shameful and flagrant example of this abuse occurred a few years ago, in the case of the two gentlemen who were about to enter the lists for the Executive chair in the State of Pennsylvania; and there have been many such cases of less notoriety, but all involving the same gross violation of principle.

I wish it were in our power to prevent, by legal enactments, another abuse of a kindred nature, and which is becoming but too common. It is the practice of training up and pampering Administration candidates—embryo members of Congress and others—a year or two before they are brought out upon the course. By this process, they are prepared to make the necessary sacrifices to secure success in their districts or States, and they make their appearance in the two Houses of Congress, or in some other station of importance to their party, already swollen, but not satiated, with spoil; with their appetites whetted, and, like those animals which having once tasted of human blood become doubly ferocious, they are more forward, unscrupulous, and untiring, than all others in their support of power. But I can think of no provision of law by which this evil can be reached. A sound state of public sentiment and morals only can remedy this mischief.

When pressing the importance of passing some law to punish bribery and corruption in the higher offices of the Government, I have been often met by the argument that, in despite of the most rigorous laws, a great deal of that sort of undue and improper influence which is denominated corruption will prevail in the administration of any Government; that it will always assume such forms and disguises as to elude detection and punishment. All this I agree to; but that does not show that penal laws may not greatly diminish the amount of the evil. Sir, if such laws can answer no other purpose than to prevent the principle of corruption from becoming incorporated into our system; from becoming the characteristic feature in its operation; from walking abroad openly and shamelessly, they will do much; for, when that time shall come, who will feel himself called upon to defend such a polluted country either with his purse or his sword? A question would then arise whether a monarchy, with the necessary appendage of a corrupt court, but leaving the mass of society pure and uncontaminated, would not be preferable to a system which can only be supported by corrupting the body of society—the people themselves!

We have laws in all the States for the punishment of bribery and corruption in the candidates and electors. This, it seems, is a species of petty bribery which it is well enough to restrain and punish. No one objects to this; but why not punish the far more injurious and wholesale bribery and corruption in the official magnates of the land? Does genuine Democracy object?

Again, sir, I have had to meet this objection: You propose to correct, as far as possible, by law, the increasing corruption and profligacy manifest in the operation of our political system; why not extend the proposed corrective to the undue and corrupt influence exercised by the banks? I am asked whether public men, members of Congress and others, may not be unduly influenced or corrupted by the banks, as well as by the offices and employments in the gift of the President? I answer, yes; and I could point out many other sources of a corrupt influence upon public men, including members of Congress, besides the banks. In truth, in every branch of the public service, in every branch of private business, there are interests and feelings to be promoted and gratified, which are more or less corrupting in their influence on the public men connected with them. But it must be borne in mind that these sources of undue influence are limited to a single object in each case, as in the instance of the banks. They have a deep interest in sustaining their charters, and in resisting a course of policy which would render them useless and unprofitable. But, as to the policy of the country generally, or as to who shall be in or who shall be out of office, the bank interest is wholly indifferent. So of any other source of corruption not connected with the public service. As to the banks, ordinarily, there are no inducements to improper influences on their part. It is only when their charters, their existence, may be in jeopardy; and then, the moment the questions in which they are concerned are settled, we hear no more of them. The evil in regard to them is necessarily transient, as well as limited in extent. The scope and object of the bill under consideration, I hope, will be regarded as sufficiently comprehensive, limited as they are to the prevention of undue influence and corruption in the administration of Executive patronage. It does not profess to provide for the punishment of bribery and corruption in every form in which it may exist. But, if I were pressed upon the subject of providing a remedy for the undue influence of the banks, or of "associated wealth," I would say that it will be perhaps fortunate for the country if the banks, or some other more powerful source of influence connected with the public liberty and prosperity, should always exist, to hold in check and counteract the constant tendency of the Federal Executive to bring within its control the whole country—every institution, public and private, all its interests, and every other branch of the Government. Banks are only to be feared when they are found in alliance with the Executive; for they are themselves liable to be corrupted and controlled by Executive influence and patronage. And gentlemen will find that the provisions of any bill which proposes to restrain the corrupting influence of the banks upon public men, must extend far beyond the precincts of the legislative department. I saw, in a recent number of the official organ, (the Globe,) a labored attack upon the Opposition, alleging a design to bring the House into contempt and disrepute with the people, in order to overthrow our free form of government. But how long has it been since that organ, and all its associate Editors, official and others, were laboring, day and night, to convince the country that a majority of both Houses of Congress were utterly corrupt, and unworthy of trust and confidence; charging directly that they were the mercenary advocates and hired instruments of the United States Bank! At a later period, our Conservative friends came in for their share of these denunciations, and the whole Opposition in Congress were then stigmatised as the servile and corrupt supporters of the State banks. Who, or what party, was it, which then sought to overthrow the Constitution, by destroying the credit of the legislative branch of the Government? The doctrine of those in power is, that none but the President and his devoted partisans are guiltless of this sin of bank influence and bank corruption! They only are immaculate! Yet, you may remember, sir, that, when it was proposed to look into the affairs of the deposite banks, to ascertain to what extent the means of speculating in the public lands by some of the high officers of the Government, and numerous favorites and partisans of the Administration besides, had been provided by those banks, it was objected that they were State institutions, and it would be a violation of State rights if Congress should assume the power to inquire into the management of their affairs! The point I wish to enforce by these remarks is this: that the banks and every other source of undue influence and corruption which does or can exist in this country, except the one struck at by this bill, are more strongly tempted and attracted—more liable, on every account, to lavish their means of corruption upon the Executive department of the Government than upon any other branch. Where there is most power and influence in moulding the policy and measures of the Government, there will fasten the mass of corrupt appliances of every kind; and that the Executive is, and has been for years, the superior and controlling branch of the Government, all the world knows. Executive officers may become, may have been, the corrupt tools and instruments of bank interest and bank influences, as well as members of Congress; and it may one day be disclosed that some of the deposite banks, acting upon the Executive department, wielded a more extensive and potent influence over the domestic policy of the country than the United States Bank ever attempted or aspired to. The temptation was great—the prize was dazzling, and the mode of operation equally daring and questionable. I will not insinuate that the late President was swayed, in the part he took in the transactions to which I allude, by corruption in his own person. This I do not believe; and, if I did, for the honor of the country, for the sake of our institutions, and of the high office which he held, I would not state it; but, what I mean to affirm is, that the country was in more danger from the corrupting influences of the banks, acting upon the official advisers of the President and other subordinate agents and instruments employed in conducting the war against the United States Bank, than it ever has, or can be, from the operation of similar influences upon the Legislature—the more numerous branch of the Government.

I have, Mr. Speaker, finished the review of the several provisions of the bill which I designed. I have extended my remarks beyond the limits I had prescribed to myself; but I could not have curtailed them and have done justice to the subject. The intrinsic importance of the question; the deep interest I have so long taken in it; and, above all, the uncommon degree of unfairness and ferocity with which this measure has been attacked, have prompted me to a full discussion of it.

And now, sir, I must be allowed to express my deep regret, I may say the deep mortification, I feel, that this subject should receive so small a share of the public attention; that it should excite so little interest in this House. I am mortified, not only on my own, but the public account. Above all, I regret that I cannot have the co-operation of the whole Whig interest in this House and out of it, on such a question. That I should meet with some opposition in the Whig ranks, I was prepared to expect; some, I supposed, might oppose this measure because they had become prejudiced and alarmed by what they had heard of the nature of the late bill of the Senate; others, because this was a new measure, and they could not, or would not spare the time to examine it, and some, because they do not regard the spoils doctrine of Governor Marcy as any heresy! But I trust there are but few Whigs in this House who hold such detestable opinions.

I would not be set down, Mr. Speaker, as a believer in the existence of absolute purity and perfection, in the management of human affairs, at any time. This, certainly, is not an age of miracles in this respect. We can only expect to witness the practice of the austere virtues in an eminent degree in primitive communities, in which there is but little to tempt the ambition or cupidity of patriotic and virtuous minds. But I would remind those who think that the "spoils" are a necessary stimulant to patriotism in resisting bad men and a ruinous Administration, that the principles of my bill will make it the solemn and bounden duty of any President who may hereafter come into power, to dismiss from office not only the unfaithful and incompetent, but all such as have gone out of their way to interfere in elections, State or national. And if there is any portion of the Whigs to whom this does not furnish sufficient ground of hope and expectation—to whom this latitude of removal does not hold out sufficient inducement to exertion—they are unreasonable and insatiate; they are not rightly sorted; they belong intrinsically to the spoils party.

I must repeat the expression of my surprise that this subject has excited so little attention here and elsewhere. To me it is strange and incomprehensible that the measure I have proposed or some other of a similar and even more radical nature, has not forced itself upon the attention of the reflecting men of the country, considering the alarming character and tendency of the times. What, in fact, has been the cause of the fierce and destructive party warfare in which we have been so long engaged, but a question of Executive patronage? It lies at the foundation of the disastrous condition of all our great interests at this moment. It has been a great and convulsive struggle on the part of the Executive to subdue every element of opposition to its will. No alternative was left but submission or destruction. Though for a long time unknown and unsuspected by many of the most ardent and patriotic of those who rejoiced in the election of General Jackson, yet subsequent events confirmed the suspicions of some at the time, that there was a settled plan—a scheme, concerted between a few of the most influential of his friends and supporters—to establish a system of Executive control, so deeply and yet so artfully combined with every great source of patronage and influence in any way connected with the Government as to set all opposition at defiance for the future, and to secure to them and their appointees undisturbed possession of power.

The first step in the execution of this plan was to make the Postmaster General a member of the Cabinet; and what was then given out as a necessary arrangement in the execution of the extensive reforms meditated by the new Administration was, in fact, designed to carry out the doctrines of the Albany school of politics, as indicated in the proceedings of 1822, already referred to; and to reduce the Post Office Department to the condition of a subservient political engine—an instrument of Executive power and influence! Was this walking in the footsteps of Jefferson? The very first principle of administration adopted by that great Republican leader, after his induction into office, was, that the Post Office Department should be preserved free and unbiassed in its operations by the partisan heat and violence of the times; nor, above all, would he allow any connection between the public press and the public post. In a letter to Mr. Macon, of North Carolina, written on the 14th of May, 1801, he informs him that "a very early recommendation had been given to the Postmaster General to employ no printer, foreigner, or revolutionary tory, in any of his offices." What he meant by excluding printers was illustrated by his positive refusal to appoint a successful and distinguished partisan Editor to an office in that Department. It has been the settled policy of the present Administration, on the contrary, wherever the circumstances were favorable, to establish such a direct connection and dependence between the public press and the public post as to insure a faithful co-operation in its support. In numerous instances, appointments have been made in this Department not only of printers, but of men that they may become printers. At last, we find, not only a printer—a hack writer of the party—but the most intolerant, violent, and proscriptive of the whole corps, placed at the head of the General Post Office! Still, these are the followers of Jefferson!

The next great public institution and source of influence to be approached and subdued was the United States Bank. It was first sounded, and, not being found pliant enough, it was menaced; and, when that would not do, forth went the fiat for its destruction. Whatever may have been the opinions formed by the uninitiated members of the party as to the particular motive of the movement against the United States Bank, and without questioning at all that there were early and deep prejudices in a certain great quarter against that institution, yet the subsequent history of the Bank warfare shows, conclusively, that the instigators and principal abettors of that war, from the beginning, were resolved to subdue its independence, or to prostrate it altogether. They were resolved not to suffer the existence of so powerful an institution, unless it could be brought to co operate with the dominant party in the political conflicts of the day—the only contingency in which such an institution is to be feared! Experience has now fully demonstrated that a United States Bank, with the strongest hold upon popular favor, added to all the extraneous, and, if you please, the corrupt influences it can bring to bear, is no match for the power of the Executive! The late Bank of the United States had the decided support, not only of the legislative department of the Government, but the cordial favor and confidence of the people themselves, in the commencement of the contest; yet it finally fell under the increasing and irresistible energy of the Executive arm! Just as every other institution and department of the Government itself is destined to fall, if this gigantic power is not speedily reduced.

When it was discovered that the bank would not yield—when its directors firmly, but respectfully, declined any co-operation with the Executive in the execution of its political schemes, the arch conspirators sought to acquire an equal amount of patronage by establishing a connection between the Executive and the most powerful of the State banks. This they readily accomplished. But when the deposite banks broke down under the accumulated burdens of excessive issues and extended credits, (a consequence of their obedience to Treasury orders)—under the effects of the specie circular, co-operating with increased commercial embarrassments, and it was foreseen that they could be of no further service in upholding the fortunes of the Administration—the money power was grasped at, through a new institution, (the Sub-Treasury,) and we now find ourselves still hotly engaged in a struggle for the independence of this power on the one hand, and its subserviency to the will and purposes of the Executive on the other—at the end of ten years from the day when the first overture was made for the control of the United States Bank! The monster power will never be appeased until it shall have drawn within its voracious jaws every element of strength and influence within the reach of its gigantic arms!

I have a word or two to say to the real Republicans—to the State Rights men, who may be inclined to support the Administration, because they are not satisfied to go with the Opposition; and I ask them, What is it you would preserve? What is it you most fear? When I observe the quiet complacency with which this one powerful and famous party look on the practices of those in power, and the general evils of the times, I must confess my astonishment. I often ask myself, when I reflect upon this subject, what has become of that tribe of pungent, fierce, and powerful writers, who once filled the columns of a celebrated journal of the South? Where have vanished those successful alarmists of the Virginia school, who kindled the fire of patriotism and determined opposition to Federal usurpation in the breast of every youthful reader? Are they dead, or do they only sleep? Have they abandoned their ancient creed; or did they only conjure up the spectre of consolidation trampling upon the rights of the States to frighten the ignorant and credulous? If, on the contrary, they were sincere in their professions, why is it that we do not hear their voice, as in times past, raised far above the ordinary din of the conflict? Do they not see that the power and influence of the States, in their organic form, are no longer felt or respected; that Federal influences and Federal interest ride over all!

What are the reserved rights of the States worth? What will be their value as carriers against the encroachment of the Fe deral Government, when the President, calling to his aid a subservient post, an affiliated and pensioned press, and a trained band of office-holders, (a hundred thousand strong,) holding their places by the tenure of party service, and receiving pay and promotion exactly upon the same principles that officers are paid and promoted in a well-regulated army, shall be able to carry the State elections with the same ease with which he controls the Federal?

But I go further; I ask the gentlemen of the State rights school to answer me, whether a potential and practical consolidation of all the powers of Government has not already taken place, and been in operation for years? Are not the followers of the Administration, the people who have given a blind and unqualified support to the Federal Executive in the States, the same people (leaders inclusive) who elect, through the same party organization, the majority of the members of the State Legislature; who, in turn, send a tool of the Federal Executive to the Senate; and are they not the same people who have sent a majority of the members to this House, and thus consolidated, to every practical purpose, our entire complex system, as it exists in theory, into one simple machine, worked by a single hand—the President?

When, by the aid of party discipline and the spoils principle, a perfect coalition and identity of feeling, interest, and action have taken place between State and Federal politics—State and Federal elections—between State and Federal patronage, and the one is made to chime in and give support to the other, in a majority of the States—what is this but consolidation?

When it has come to pass that in many of the States a common roster is kept of favorite applicants for office, State and Federal—for State and Federal spoil; when the State caucuses or juntos decree who shall fill a vacancy arising by removal or otherwise, whether in a Federal or State employment, and the President, as the head of the party, if it be an office under the Federal Government, is bound to ratify the selection—what is this but consolidation?

When the President, in this manner, acts in the double capacity of chief dispenser of the patronage of the Federal Government, and ex officio chairman or presiding officer of an organized party association extending over the Union, and which is identified in feeling, object, and interest with the majority which rules the executive and legislative action of the States themselves—what is this but consolidation? And what does or has prevented the Federal Executive from dictating the measures and policy of the States upon any subject whatever? Though it may be true that the President cannot enact a single law relating to the currency or the banks, or internal improvements in any one of the States, does that impair his power, as long as his recommendations are received as the decrees of the party, and obeyed as such? Thus it has happened that, while our modern State Rights friends are declaiming against internal improvements, a protective tariff, and a United States Bank, and denouncing them because they lead to consolidation, lo! a consolidation of all actual power is already vested in the President; for he is the actual depositary of all power who influences and controls the action of all the departments of Government, both State and Federal; and as long as the President has the means at hand to secure a majority of the people of the States, he is necessarily absolute in authority!

Yes, sir, a practical consolidation has existed for years; and it only remains to be seen whether the Government can be restored to its constitutional action. What would it now avail to leave Congress, as in times past, to go home, and throw ourselves into the Legislatures of the States, those boasted strongholds of liberty, those impregnable fortresses, where a successful stand, it was supposed, could always be made against Federal usurpation? When you shall get there, you will find the same powerful hand controlling every movement which you see here—you will find the same secret, invisible and yet irresistible influence, paralyzing and defying all opposition there, just as we have often witnessed in this House—there you will find the same unlimited and unqualified support of Executive measures, right or wrong, which has so long characterized Congress. In fine, you will behold party and party interests omnipotent, and riding over every thing there, as every where else. Is this not consolidation?

Melancholy as the truth may be, yet so it is, that, under the prevalent system of party tactics, with the aid of the spoils principle, the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, the appointing officer and his council, the impeaching or inquisitorial body, and the State Executives and Legislatures, have the same electors, the same constituency, and are all under the control of one man! The Senate is no longer a check on the appointing power of the President; the House, as the impeaching or inquisitorial body, has lost all its terrors; nor are the States or their Legislatures any longer a check upon Federal power. All the checks and balances contemplated by the Constitution are defeated and annulled in practice. The President, so far from being liable to be called to account or checked by either of the other departments of the Government or by the States, is in fact their master, and controls them!

Let me not be told that this vast fragment of ill-got en power and influence is already beginning to totter; that it is no longer that formidable and impregnable lodgment of false men and false principles which I have described. What has been may happen again; and, whatever may be the fate of this Administration, I am convinced that, if it shall be overthrown, it will be by a rare combination of circumstances, and such as can scarcely be expected to occur again in a century.

Mr. Speaker, my judgment informs me that I ought here to close my remarks, but my feelings still inpel me on. I cannot refrain from presenting to the House and country some further views connected with this subject which are constantly present to my mind.

I have already and repeatedly expressed my opinion of the importance of retrenching the power and influence of the Executive; of the imperious necessity of correcting now, while we may, those abuses which have crept into our system, unless we are prepared to see the Constitution, our glorious plan of civil liberty, go down and be lost forever. If the present state of things shall continue, with all their aggravations, our system cannot last; the legislative department especially can no longer perform its appropriate functions. This fatal spoils principle, of which I have already said so much, has at last developed itself to public view, in its effects upon the proceedings and the character of this House, in a most striking manner. We have lately been warned by the official organ that this body is in danger of becoming so degraded that ere long it may cease to be respected as a co-ordinate branch of the Government. Sir, this is a melancholy fact, and no man who has been a witness to our proceedings can deny or gainsay it. Alas! sir, it is but too true. As to any effective purposes, such as were designed by the Constiiution, this body has failed, signally failed, during the present session. Have we not become the laugh, the scorn, the by-word, not only of men of sense, whether at home or abroad, but of the great body of the people? I have within the last few years addressed many and numerous assemblies of the people, under circumstances of great excitement—assemblies untrained, altogether untaught, in the conventional forms and ceremonies of legislative bodies—assemblies often convened in the open air—before whom the heated and excited leaders and partisans on both sides appeared and debated all the agitating topics of the day; but in no instance—in no such assembly—have I witnessed so little self respect, so reckless a disregard of the decencies and proprieties due upon such occasions to the great interests of the Constitution—to the character and preservation of our common country—as I have witnessed from day to day in this House during the present session. Isay this, irrespective of parties. Is there any gentleman within my hearing who thinks I do injustico to our proceedings? We have, so far, failed altogether! As a legislative body, we have become, for the time, impracticable, inefficient—absolutely paralyzed, palsied in the discharge of our duties—our great constitutional duties! The Treasury, we have been repeatedly told, is exhausted. The Government, if not actually bankrupt, is upon the eve of bankruptcy. But the wailing cry of an exhausted Treasury—the honor of the Government—has not been sufficient to arrest or divert the attention of the House from a class of questions more deeply rooted in favor and interest. The interest of party; the spoils interest; the spoils principle, reign triumphant here! and not only here, but in almost every part of the Union besides. It is come to this, that we cannot organize the House, we cannot elect a Clerk or a Printer, but in strict reference to party ascendency, and the possession of the spoils; nor is any other question or matter regarded as of the slightest weight or consideration, when coming in conflict with these superior and paramount interests! The breaking up of the House in riot and disorder—disorganization itself, imposes no restraint in a conflict for the spoils. You need not flatter yourself, sir, that the high station which you fill, and to which I was considered an aspirant, was the chief cause of such intense excitement and agitation. No, no, sir! that would have been more honorable to the character of our proceedings. You, sir, have no patronage. It was a contest for the control and distribution of the patronage connected with the offices of the Clerk and Printer to the House! It was a question who should have the distribution of the hundred thousand dollars to be expended in supplying stationery, and doing the printing of the House! For such an object, the whole country was thrown into alarm, and all established modes of proceeding set aside and disregarded! I mean not this as a rebuke, nor as a censure upon one party only. I consider the remarks as applicable to the subject. I have never spoken of this detestable spoils doctrine as tainting one party only; though I trust I am justified by the fact, when I state that it is more particularly the doctrine of one party than of the other. But I call upon my Whig friends from those States in which this doctrine prevails to any extent, to reflect upon recent events. I conjure them—I invoke their patriotism upon this subject, in putting down this dangerous and patal policy. I ask them if they have not already had sufficient warning of the inevitable results to which this principle must lead? Three years ago I predicted that riot, violence, and bloodshed must soon attend our elections in those sections in which the public offices are made the chief incentives to political agitation. Little did I imagine then that, in less than two years from that time, so signal and memorable an illustration of nearly all I had foretold would be furnished, as the scenes at the opening of the Legislature at Harrisburg exhibited. Nor still less did it enter into my imagination that we were, at so early a period in the progress of this infamous spoils system, to witness in the official journal of the Executive Administration of the Federal Government, (the Globe,) a direct and unequivocal approval of such irregular, violent, and disorganizing proceedings, and an indirect appeal to the partisans of the Administration to resort to the same means to secure the triumph of their friends in the organization of this House? Will not these examples suffice to convince any real friend of the Constitution and of the public tranquillity that the spoils principle is incompatible with the maintenance of either? When I speak of the drama enacted at Harrisburg, I have no allusion to the details, nor do I wish to cast censure upon one party more than another. I look to the origin—the foundation of the proceeding. I trace it to the spoils principle. I look to the principles and objects avowed by the principal actors in it. Under the operation of the spoils principle, elections will be carried either by fraud or force, by hope or fear, by bribery or personal violence, by club law, or, in the last resort, by the sword! Total disorganization of all constitutional government must one day follow. The purpose of the rioters—their object at Harrisburg—was openly avowed; it was, by intimidation, by force, and violence, if need be, to overawe and coerce the constitutional authorities in the organization of the legislative body. This is but the beginning of evil. When the fruits of this odious policy shall be ripened into maturity, we shall all be of one mind in regard to it. But what will be the condition of our country? Settled down into a silent, withering despotism, or existing only in eternal anarchy and frequent bloodshed.

That I may not be thought unjust to any party, in reprobating the spoils as the principal inducement and s imulant to the heat and violence of the times, in but too many quarters, I wish to refer to a single authority, which I hope will be considered satisfactory by the friends of the Administration in this House:

"Elections are commonly looked upon as a mere game, on which depend the division of party spoils, the distribution of chartered privileges, and the allotment of pecuniary rewards. * * * And the struggle, which should be one of pure reason, with no aim but the achievement of political truth, and the promotion of the greatest good of the greatest number, sinks into a mere brawl, in which passion, avarice, and profligacy are the prominent actors."

Will gentlemen believe me when I tell them that I read from the "Democratic Review," of as late a date as January, 1840? This, then, is the approved sentiment of one of the most leading organs of the party in power. I want no stronger confirmation of all I have said on this subject, nor better proof of the necessity of legislative action.

Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware of the odium I incur in certain quarters by bringing forward and pressing this bill. I now full well the arduousness of the task I have assumed in ttempting to make it palatable to the taste of gentlemen wh make a livelihood of politics, and think there is no honesty in their calling. I am sure, in truth, that I shall never succeed in doing that; but I have a higher hope of the result of my efforts, among the people and the honest statesmen, who, I believe, are to be found in every section of the Union. It is not at all surprising that I should be assailed with so much venom and malignity by the leading supporters of the Administration. It is with them a question of life and death. There are many in their ranks of keen sagacity and deep observation. They are perfectly aware of the ground of that active support which has upheld their power so long. Take it away, and they are undone!

That the leading advisers and supporters of the Administration have always had a perfect knowledge of the sources of their power, was clear from the acute sensibility which they manifested upon the introduction of this bill three years ago. It was then, as it is now, intended merely to give the force and effect of law to certain principles which had been held sound and orthodox by every leading Republican of the country in times past. The official organ forthwith denounced it as a base libel upon the character and principles of the Administration. This was expected to be received as a positive denial that any such abuses as the bill proposed to remedy were, in fact, practised by the Administration; and it had the desired effect with the faithful and credulous followers of power. But as the measure was then altogether new, and few were prepared to give it their support, the author escaped further animadversion on that score—nor was there any further symptom of alarm in the official ranks.

But when a gentleman of great ability and just weight of character, at a later period, thought proper to give the influence of his name and talents to a similar measure in another part of the Capitol, it appears to have been conjectured that the entire force of the Opposition was about to be brought out in favor of it; and the consequence was, that the whole Administration hive were thrown into commotion. Such a fluttering and buzzing—such a preparation of stings and darts among all the members of the community, had not been known upon any similar occasion of alarm for years. It was evident that the wary and experienced saw imminent danger in the movement to the whole fraternity—they saw that the vital principle of their association was struck at.

You have heard, Mr. Speaker, that there are in the world such strange and unnatural beings as human vampires—human beings who subsist upon human blood—extracting it stealthily from the warm and beating veins and arteries of sleeping victims! monsters, who, when driven from the society of the living, after drinking of the fresh and running streams of life, take up their abode among the cemeteries of the dead, and glut their unnatural and insatiate appetites by feeding upon the congealed fountains of extinct animation, thus converting into spoil the very principle of life itself! I have somewhere read a story of one of these strange beings, who was said to have made his appearance in Paris during the reign of Napoleon. It was remarked that, in whatever innocent and unsuspecting family he had the address to introduce himself and to become a frequent visiter, some young and tender member of it gradually declined in strength and health, and finally died. At last, a young man, driven to desperation by the death of his mistress, and attributing his misfortune to some mys erious influence of the stranger who had been admitted as a visiter in her family, made an assault upon his person, and, being hard pressed by his superior and almost preternatural strength, drew from his pocket a small knife, and gave him a slight wound in the side, when, lo! he sank lifeless on the ground; and upon examination, it was found that he was bleeding profusely, from seven different wounds, all of which appeared to have been just inflicted! But this was not the greatest mystery connected with the history of this unnatural being. It is stated that his body was ferreted away by some young physicians the following night, who, by some means, never disclosed, staunched his wounds, and restored animation; and, to the amazement of all who had known him, in about a month he reappeared upon his accustomed walks. The officers of the police, however, thought him a fit subject for legal examination and punishment. He was closely watched in all his movements, and at last apprehended; but the chief of the police, in order to satisfy his own and the Emperor's curiosity in regard to the strange stories in circulation as to the mysterious life, death, and reappearance of the prisoner, resolved to make an experiment upon him in the presence of the most learned and experienced surgeons in Paris. For this purpose he was first securely bound with cords. During this process his eyes were wild and restless, but he was otherwise composed, until he saw the chief of police approach with a small and well known surgical instrument. He comprehended, at a glance, the nature and certain effect of the experiment about to be tried upon him. He raved, he raged, he swore, he threatened vengeance; his whole system was convulsed with passion; but it would not do—his preternatural strength was no longer of any avail. The lancet was applied; his skin, swollen with spoil of human blood, was successfully punctured; his wounds were all opened, and bled afresh; nor could all the skill and experience of the attending surgeons save his life. He expired, nor did he ever revive!

Not unlike were the writhings and agonies of that overgrown vampire party, which at this moment subsists upon and revels in the very life-blood of their country's prosperity and happiness, when surgeon Crittenden proposed to make the experiment of puncturing their swollen and bloated carcass; and such, too, will be their miserable exit, whenever the constituted authorities shall be wise enough to sanction the operation necessary to reach the deep-seated vitals of their reeking spoils system. Then, die they must—never to hope again!

SPEECH OF MR. SMITH.

OF INDIANA,

In Senate, May 15, 1840—On the bill to establish a Uniform System of Bankruptcy, and the substitute proposed as an amendment.

Mr. SMITH said: I am not, Mr. President, a volunteer in this debate. I did not design speaking to-day. As one of the majority of the Judiciary Committee that reported the bill, I had thought it highly probable that I should, at some period of the discussion, give the reasons that had brought my mind to the conclusion that the bill reported by the majority of the committee was entitled to a preference over the substitute proposed by the chairman, [Mr. WALL;] but I did not design doing so at this stage of the debate. However, as other Senators have declined to address the Senate to-day, and as the session is drawing to a close, and it is important that the bill should, if at all, be sent to the House at an early day, I feel impelled by considerations which I am not at liberty to disregard, to present at this time to the Senate my views on this important subject. I cannot flatter myself that I shall be able to cast much new light upon it, after the very able speeches of the Senators who have preceded me. I hope, however, to be able to draw at least some outlines over the canvass for more skilful hands to fill up and embellish.

I willingly confess, sir, that the subject of bankruptcy, notwithstanding its importance, had received but little attention from me until very recently. Like other students of the law, I had read something in relation to it—had glanced my eye over the British statutes on the subject; but I had made no special examination of it, with its relations and regulation by the Constitution of the United States, and its exclusion from the jurisdiction and powers of the individual States. My position recently as a member of the Judiciary Committee, charged with the subject by the direction of the Senate, has made it my duty to become better acquainted with it than I had been; still I cannot but presume that each member of the Senate has turned his attention to the matter, in all probability to better advantage than I have, Mr. President.

There have been no questions submitted to, or discussed in, the Senate this session more important in all their bearings than those presented by the bill and proposed substitute. The questions of the exercise of Federal and State powers involved are of momentous importance and fearful magnitude. It will be my object to meet those questions fairly, and to examine them candidly. I concur entirely, sir, with the chairman of the committee in the statement that the subject under discussion should not be mixed up with party politics. As all parties are interested alike in the passage of some bill, we should steer clear of those rocks that lie in the road of a partisan discussion, and upon which we may wreck the fondest hopes of those whom we all desire to relieve.

Coeval with the existence of civil contracts and of the relation of creditor and debtor were remedies devised by the sovereign power in every country to enforce contracts and compel debtors to comply with their undertakings, as far as was within their power. Consequent upon the grant of the remedy to the creditor against the person and property of the debtor, arose the necessity of providing relief to him after he had done every thing in his power to discharge his debts; hence insolvent and bankrupt laws; the germ of the latter of which we find to have been early implanted in Venice, afterwards engrafted into the civil or Roman law, under the appellation of the cessio bonorum, which only released the debtor and discharged the debt pro tanto; and from thence we find the principle following in the tread of civilization, and connecting itself with the remedial laws of Great Britain. The bankrupt policy of Great Britain is no part of the common law; it is the creature of the British statutes, the first of which was passed in the reign of Henry VIII, and applied generally to all who "did make bankrupt." The provisions of that act were somewhat extended and directed to traders in their operation by the act of Elizabeth, which in its turn was amended by the acts of George on the same subject. I do not think it necessary, sir, to go at large into the provisions of these British statutes. I refer to them as the origin of the exercise of the power by the British Government over the subject of bankruptcy, or bankus ruptus. The objects of the bankrupt laws of Great Britain have varied from time to time; and although, as has been stated by the chairman of the committee, [Mr. WALL,] the avowed object has been, in all the statutes passed since the statute of Henry VIII, to confine the operation of the acts to the relation of creditor and debtor, where the debtor was a trader, still Parliament assumed and exercised the power of declaring any person a trader; and by that means all debtors, at the discretion of the law-making power, were brought within the operation of the bankrupt laws of Great Britain; so that I take it as being an incontrovertible position that even in England it was not originally essential to the question of jurisdiction over the subject of bankruptcy that he should be a trader, nor is it so under the statutes of Elizabeth or George, as it is legislative mockery to say that, by enacting that a "scavenger" is a trader, you can by that means make him so; hence I take it as a settled question that the power of Parliament is plenary to bring within the provisions of the bankrupt laws of Great Britain all the debtors of the kingdom who may become broken, bankrupt, or insolvent, and unable to pay their debts. I introduce this argument, sir, because it is contended by the chairman of the committee that even here we are confined by the operations of the Constitution of the United States to the passage of a bankrupt law operating on traders alone, and because he contends that bankrupt, as named in the Constitution, ex vi termini, means an insolvent debtor, who is a trader in the technical sense of that term, both of which positions I controvert. At the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the object and general operation of the statutes on the subject of bankruptcy were undoubtedly familiar to the members of the convention. It must have been known that the subjects of bankruptcy in that Government were created by statute, and not confined to any specified class of individuals; nor could it have escaped the minds of those great and wise men that the power by any Government of discharging a debtor from his contract was a high political power, which should not be placed in the possession of any but the supreme power of the nation, where its principles could be rendered certain and its operations uniform.

The Government of the United States was about to be placed on the bases of the Constitution. The Federal and State Governments were to occupy such grounds as would enable each to act independently within its sphere of constitutional powers; and, in the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the States retained all the powers they previously possessed, which were not given up by the Constitution to the Federal Government by express terms, or which were not necessary to carry into effect the express delegations of power. In many cases, concurrent powers were retained by the States, as in the taxing power. The rule, I believe, on that subject, is this: that a grant of power to the Federal Government does not exclude the States from the exercise of similar powers, unless such exercise by the States is inconsistent with the powers granted, or unless the exercise of such powers by the States is expressly prohibited by the Federal Constitution.

Having stated these positions, I will call the attention of the Senate to those parts of the Constitution of the United States upon which is based the power over the subject of bankruptcy, and show that the power to discharge a debtor from his contract is granted to the Federal Government, and prohibited to the States, while the latter, in the absence of any prohibitory clause, are authorized to act upon the subject of insolvency so far as to release the body, but not to discharge the contract. "Congress shall have power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy throughout the United States." Here, sir, is the express delegation of power, ample, plenary, and unrestricted, except that the laws passed shall be "uniform throughout the United States." We have heard already, in the debate that has taken place, much said in relation to the meaning of the term uniform in this clause. It seems to me to admit of but one construction; and that is, that all laws on the subject of bankruptcy shall be uniform in all the States, over all the subjects embraced within their provisions; that there shall be no laws passed by Congress on the subject of bankruptcy, to operate differently on the citizens of the different States. This was one of the evils to be apprehended from the action of the several States over the subject, a want of that uniformity which Congress alone could secure. It may be contended that the word uniform was designed to make it obligatory on Congress to include all persons in the provisions of laws passed on the subject, who may be insolvent. I think this construction not the true one, although I admit and contend for the power to include all insolvent persons. Still I do not believe that the term uniform requires more than that the laws should act uniformly on all persons embraced within their provisions in all the States; any other construction would defeat the objects of a bankrupt law, as persons failing for a few dollars are excluced, as are those who have lost at gaming a certain sum within a given time, as well as those who shall have preferred creditors, in anticipation of availing themselves of the benefit of the act. Hence, in the very nature of the proceedings, under a bankrupt law, there must be exceptions; and, consequently, the law would want uniformity, and violate the Constitution. Such cannot be the true construction.

Mr. President, I trust I have said enough upon this point to make myself understood. I will now pass to the clause in the Constitution which prohibits the States from passing a bankrupt law. "No State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts." Here you see, sir, the power over the subject of bankruptcy—which is a power over the contract—is expressly prohibited to the States. In the absence of such prohibition, the States, by virtue of their sovereignty, could have exercised that power, as does the Parliament of Great Britain. The States, however, not having surrendered the power over insolvency so far as regards the remedy and the discharge of the person, are authorized to exercise it within their constitutional limits, subject to some limitations, which I deem it important to advert to before I pass from this branch of the subject. I desire, sir, to be explicit on this part of the argument, and I feel confident that it will neither be time lost nor misapplied, to claim the attention of the Senate to some judicial opinions on the subject. I hope I shall not be charged with having too much reverence for, or too high an opinion of, the judicial decisions of my own State, when I say to the Senate that, in my examination of the authorities on this subject, I have been able to find no decision more full, ample, clear, and conclusive, than the decision of the Supreme Court of my State, pronounced by Judge Stevens, in the case of Pugh vs. Bussel, 2 Blackford's Reports. After collating the authorities, the court says:

"It is now a settled doctrine in all courts, that the discharge of an insolvent debtor from arrest and imprisonment only is not an infringement of the obligation of the contract. The imprisonment of the person of the debtor is no part of the law of the contract—is simply a means of coercion; hence, those laws that only release the body of the insolvent from arrest and imprisonment are constitutional and valid. And it is equally well settled that a discharge of the insolvent, after acquired property, is an infringement of the obligation of the contract, and those State laws which release not only the body of the insolvent, but also his after acquired property, are laws impairing the obligation of contracts, and are unconstitutional and void."

I read this part of the decision to sustain my position that the States have no power to discharge the contract, and release the debtor from its obligation. I will now proceed to show the total inefficiency of State insolvent laws as substitutes for a uniform bankrupt law, and why it is that all persons who admit the necessity and humanity of insolvent State laws should advocate a voluntary bankrupt law, operating over the same class of unfortunate debtors. In the first place, the want of uniformity presents an insuperable objection to those laws, which does not maintain against a bankrupt law; as, in the one case, the State insolvent laws will unavoidably be as multiform and variant as the opinions of the Legislatures that enact them; while the bankrupt law will operate uniformly over all citizens coming within its provisions, of all the States.

Another insurmountable difficulty in the operation of State insolvent laws consists in the inadequacy of the power that creates them, in consequence of its local jurisdiction. To be more explicit, the lex loci governs the contract, and not the lex fori; the law of the place where the contract was made, and not the law of the forum in which the remedy is sought. Hence, the power of the Legislature of a particular State can only be extended over the citizens of the State upon contracts made within the State, to be executed there, unless foreigners, that is, citizens of other States, voluntarily make themselves parties to the proceedings in the State courts where the remedy is sought. To be more explicit still—for I desire to be understood by all who shall hear or read my remarks—a citizen of Indiana contracts a debt with a citizen of Pennsylvania, suit is brought in the State of Indiana, and the debtor takes the benefit of the insolvent laws of that State, which discharge the body, but leave the after acquired property subject to the payment of the debt; the defendant afterwards visits New York, Pennsylvania, or any other State, and is sued on the judgment; in such case, he could not plead the discharge under the insolvent laws of Indiana to release his person, nor could he, even upon a discharge from the second suit, avail himself of it in a third suit, in another State, upon the record, unless the creditor had thought proper to make himself a party to the proceedings under the insolvent acts. Upon this point, I will read a portion of the decision to which I have alluded. The court, after presenting the authorities upon the subject, sums up:

"These cases establish the doctrine beyond a controversy, that a discharge by a State law operates only on contracts made in the State between its own citizens, which are to be executed there, and that such laws have no operation out of the State over contracts not made and to be carried into effect within the State, nor over citizens of other States, unless they voluntarily make themselves parties to the proceedings which lead to a discharge in the State courts."

It must be obvious, then, that the power of the States over the question of insolvency is wholly defective and inefficient to meet the object of relief, even in the passage of insolvent laws, independent of their want of power to give uniformity to their action on the subject. This power is ample and plenary in the Federal Government. She has, by virtue of the clauses of the Constitution which I have read, full power over the entire subject of bankruptcy, provided she makes her laws uniform. Has she power to make them uniform? I have shown that the States have not. I answer, she has; none of the obstacles lie in her way that do in that of the States. The citizens of all the States are equally citizens of the United States. Contracts made in any of the States are equally contracts made in the United States. Both the citizens and the contracts are subject to the same jurisdiction. The lex loci cannot be in conflict with the lex fori, for both are subject to the same power. So far as the grant of powers is contained in the Constitution, and for all the purposes of carrying them into effect, the power is as ample as if there were no State Governments. Hence, a discharge in one State is a discharge in every State, and may be so pleaded. I introduce this argument, and am more explicit upon it than I otherwise would be, were it not that I am aware that it may be said by citizens of my own State that our insolvent laws are ample for all the purposes of relief of the body from imprisonment.

I come now, sir, to the main question in relation to the policy and object of a bankrupt law. I have shown that the State insolvent laws are wholly inefficient, even as such, to discharge the person in all cases; that in no instance can they discharge the contract, that power being by the Constitution vested in Congress alone. I admit, sir, that the exercise of this power is one of the highest efforts of sovereignty or supremacy that can be exercised by the supreme power in any country, and that it should never be called into action except where the object to be attained is of a character to justify the measure. What, then, are the objects in passing a bankrupt law at this time? I answer, objects the most noble and humane that the mind can conceive of—nothing short of liberating from a condition that fills the heart of the philanthropist with sympathy, a large and respectable but unfortunate class of our fellow-citizens, who have been stricken down by the vicissitudes of fortune and the casualties of business, and who now lie prostrate before us, with many an eye to pity, but no hand to save; a class of men whose energies are paralyzed, and whose usefulness as citizens is destroyed. The object of a bankrupt law is to bring this class of citizens once more to act their part in the great drama of human affairs; to elevate them from the character of bondmen to that of free and independent citizens; to restore them to society; to call into activity and usefulness all the energies of their character; to strike off the fetters and set the bondmen free. After a debtor is driven to the wall, after the whole of his means are exhausted in the payment of his debts, what benefit can result to any one to keep a debt hanging over him? None that can be conceived of. You by that means either drive him to dissipation, indolence, and vice, and leave his unprotected family to the mercy of a cold unfeeling world, without the means of support, or, if the energy of his character should prove too elastic to remain subdued, you compel him to seek, under cover of the name of some more fortunate and less honest individual, a shield for his subsequently acquired means. While trials of the right of property follow each step of his success in acquiring it, a plentiful number of oaths are sowed and a heavy harvest of perjuries reaped in the process. The debtor has little inducement to renovated exertions, and the creditor is not, cannot be benefited, by keeping the victim pinioned and the fatal scales suspended.

I am not unapprized of the argument that has been used against the exercise of this power, for I confess it made some impression on my mind; it is, that it may encourage unwarrantable risks in business, and thereby change the character of our business men into that of commercial gamblers, throwing every thing upon the cast of the die, with a certainty of relief should the throw prove unfortunate. To this it may be answered, with reference to the bill before the Senate, that, as there has not been any bankrupt law in existence for forty years, the cases that now exist, and which will come within the provisions of the law, could not have been induced with reference to any relief that may now be afforded, and as the bill is limited to a short period (two years, which may possibly be extended to five) the operation of its provisions will be confined principally to the cases which have occurred, or to persons so circumstanced at this time, that ultimate relief will be sought under this bill; hence, so far as this measure is concerned, there is no danger to be apprehended from that source; and, indeed, it may be well questioned whether the objection is not more specious than solid. I hold it to be a universally established principle of human nature, with very few exceptions, that men strive to maintain a fair and respectable standing among their fellow-men; the inducement to virtuous and honest action is so strong, and the penalty affixed by the universal consent of civilized man to vicious and dishonest conduct is so heavy, that few men are to be found who would not greatly prefer the certainty of a fair standing for honesty and integrity, to the risk of forfeiting all by imprudence, extra overaction, and fraud. The condition of a bankrupt is not, cannot be sought for; it is the death of the business man in one sense, and like the death of the natural man. Few there are who would desire to hasten the time, in anticipation of the joys of the resurrection.

Mr. President, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, to which this subject was referred, and as one of the majority of that committee who reported this bill, I feel myself called upon to notice the opening remarks of the chairman of the committee, (Mr. WALL.) I am satisfied the Senator could not have intended any thing personal or unkind towards the majority of the committee who differed from him and the Senator from North Carolina, the minority, on the question submitted to them. The chairman, however, had thought proper to state to the Senate that the majority of the committee had produced the bill before the Senate from the secret recesses of the committee room.

[Here Mr. WALL rose and said he thought he had explained that matter; he intended to make no charge against the majority of the committee; what he intended to say was, that there was no warrant in the Constitution or the papers referred to the committee, for such a bill as that reported by the majority.]

So I desire to understand the Senator, for I would be slow to believe that any thing unkind or uncourteous could fall from any one member of the Judiciary Committee towards another, such has been the uniform, kind, courteous, and frank intercourse of all the members of that committee in their individual and official relations. But, sir, the explanation of the Senator leaves me precisely where I was when he thought proper to suspend my remarks. The statement is, that the majority of the committee, in reporting the bill before the Senate, acted without warrant either in the Constitution or the petitions and memorials referred to the committee. I not only controvert this position of the chairman, but make precisely the same statement in relation to the substitute reported by him, and now offered as an amendment to the bill before the Senate.

I will proceed to offer to the Senate some remarks on these positions; and, in doing so, it will be my object to meet the objections of the Senator to the bill reported by the majority of the committee, in a spirit of candor becoming my position as well as the importance of the subject under discussion. For, sir, I assure the Senate that a momentary triuuph would but poorly compensate me for the passage of a bill violating the Constitution of the United States, or in opposition to the wishes of the people.

What are we to understand by the objection that the bill reported is without warrant in the Constitution? The Senator has told us what he understands by the statement. He contends that the bill is unconstitutional because it does not give a remedy to the creditor as well as relief to the debtor; or, in other words, because it provides for voluntary, and does not include involuntary or compulsory, bankruptcy. To this position I answer, that, by the Constitution of the United States, the whole subject of bankruptcy, in all its bearings, objects, and relations, is committed to Congress, without any restriction whatever as to the exercise of the power, except that of requiring uniformity in the laws. I have already shown what we are to understand by the term uniform as used in that clause of the Constitution. I have shown that it only requires laws passed by Congress on the subject to operate with uniformity over the subjects embraced within their provisions in all the States. I have also, I trust, succeeded in maintaining that the term uniform has no application to either the number or character of the persons included in the provisions of the law, but merely that the action of the law shall be uniform over those that the legislative power may, in its discretion, include in its provisions; hence the power to include merely debtors, giving to the creditor all the rights he could enjoy under the proceedings had they been introduced by himself. The whole debtor or insolvent class may be included, or only a part, at the discretion of Congress, without at all affecting the uniformity of the law, or the law may be extended so as to include a remedy to the creditor to institute the proceedings, or what is termed involuntary or compulsory bankruptcy; and if the law was uniform in its operation in all the States over all the persons and objects included within its provisions, it would be equally constitutional. Hence I hold, sir, that it is a question of Congressional discretion, and not of constitutional power, that is raised by the first objection of the Senator.

The next ground of objection urged against the bill by the chairman is, that it is unconstitutional, because its provisions are extended to all insolvent debtors, whether they be traders or not. In order to sustain this position, we have been pointed to the meaning of the term bankrupt. We have been told that the term ex vi termini refers and applies exclusively to insolvent traders, and that it cannot be extended beyond that class; still, in the next breath, the Senator is compelled to admit that, in England, Parliament has the power, and continually exercises it, of declaring any person a trader in its discretion, and by that means bringing such person within the provisions of her bankrupt laws. It is not pretended here but what Congress has as full and ample powers over the whole subject of bankruptcy as has the Parliament of Great Britain, nor will I presume such a pretence set up. Then, sir, if Congress were even confined to the sphere of action over this subject that the British Parliament is, it would be only necessary to amend the first section of the bill by inserting, all insolvent debtors who shall owe the sum of one hundred dollars, or any other given sum, shall be considered traders, and entitled to the benefit of the law. What a solemn mockery would this present. Can the Constitution of the United States be thus amended? Are we to be driven to a subterfuge like this, to bring our laws within the provisions of the Constitution? The Senator says our powers are limited. Where does he find that limitation? Where is the limitation of the power of the Parliament of Great Britain over the same subject? The Senator would answer, it is limited to traders. I reply, all may be declared traders at the discretion of Parliament, and then I ask the Senator, where is the limitation? I answer my own question, by saying it is in the discretion of Parliament in England, and in the discretion of Congress here. The limitation is not in the constitutional power, but in the legislative discretion in the exercise of that power, by the term uniform. Hence I trust the Senate will be satisfied that the constitutional objection to the bill on that ground cannot be maintained.

Mr. President, I cannot justify myself before my State in passing from this branch of the subject without saying a few words, in addition, in relation to the exercise of this power. Sir, I am unwilling to believe that it ever entered into the minds of the sages and patriots who passed through the Revolutionary struggle and achieved our independence, that a Government was to be established for this people creating a privileged class of citizens, who, in their natural capacity, were to receive benefits, and to whom should be extended measures of relief not common to the rest of their fellow-citizens; nor can I believe that, in the formation of the Federal Constitution, and in the insertion of the power over the subject of bankruptcy in that instrument, the members of the Convention could have supposed that it would ever be seriously contended that they had selected a class of our citizens, and prepared for them a relief from the obligations of their contracts which was denied to other citizens. Our Government is based on the broad principles of equality—both penal and remedial laws are placed by the Constitution on that basis. It was for the establishment of that principle that we encountered the power of Great Britain in our infancy, and it would be presuming too much to say that the framers of the Constitution, in its adoption, surrendered that vital principle of our Government. It is a presumption not to be indulged in, unless we are driven to it by proof too strong to be controverted, which is not the case in the present instance. But why, sir, let me ask, in all seriousness, should the benefits of the relief afforded to insolvent debtors by the operations of a bankrupt law be confined to traders, in exclusion of the other classes of our citizens whose misfortunes oblige them to take shelter under its provisions? Sir, I can see no grounds for such a distinction. Why should traders be the preferred class? Are they more meritorious than the manufacturer, the mechanic, the farmer, the professional man, and other classes? Will this be pretended? Are they more devoted to the interest and institutions of their country than those classes? Are their feelings under misfortunes more intense, or their families more dear to them, than are those of other classes? Are they more useful members of society? Is the Government under any greater obligations to that class than to every other class of our citizens? Can there be a single reason given why that class shall be discharged from their contracts, and other classes left subject to the obligation of theirs? Is it that the trading classes have greater risks to encounter? If so, have they not usually greater security for that risk? Traders are business men: they scarcely take a step without covering, to a greater or less extent, the risk by insurance; while the other classes usually rely on their own good fortune against losses from the various casualties that property is liable to. All classes of our citizens contract debts; all are liable to be overtaken by adverse fortune; all may be placed in the condition of bankruptcy; and the relief afforded should be equally applicable to all. I can, for my life, see no good reason why you will remove the fetters of obligation from the trader, and not from the farmer. All the reasons which would induce you to liberate the one and restore him to society upon terms of perfect equality with his fellow-citizens, apply with equal force to the other. Philanthropy, in selecting objects for her sympathy, could not overlook the misfortunes of the one, and drop the tear of pity on the other. But, sir, I contend that the distinction would be unjust as well as unequal. Let me illustrate this position by stating a case that might occur. A farmer sells the produce of his farm to the trader, takes his obligation for the payment of the price at a given day; the farmer is indebted to the amount of the price, and relies upon the payment to enable him to discharge his debt; the trader is unfortunate, and takes the benefit of the bankrupt law, and is discharged from the contract without having paid a dollar of the amount. The farmer is denied the benefit of the bankrupt law, because he is not a trader, and is driven to the State insolvent laws for relief. His person is released, if the contract and jurisdiction are such as to justify a release upon the principles I have already stated in a former part of my argument. But his after acquired property would be liable to pay the original debt he owed, while he could never look to his debtor, the trader, for a cent of the amount with which he expected to discharge his debt. The same idea might be illustrated in many ways; but I trust I am intelligible and understood on this point. There might possibly, in England, have been some reasons for confining the operation of bankrupt laws to particular classes, but even there we find Parliament extending the provisions of their laws to most classes; and it is not risking too much to say that, in a few years more, even there, the force of enlightened justice and equally balanced philanthropy will tear away the arbitrary line of distinction in toto, and extend to all insolvent persons, of every class, the benefits of their bankrupt laws. I therefore contend, sir, that justice to every class of our fellow-citizens requires that we should place them in our enactments on the broad platform of equality. I know no distinction among my fellow-citizens, and I cannot advocate a law that would grant relief to one class, and deny a similar relief to another. I am now, sir, speaking of a voluntary bankrupt law. I shall come to the other branch of the subject in examining the other charge of the chairman of the committee; that is, that the committee had no authority to report the bill before the Senate.

The constitutional power I have discussed. I will proceed to take some notice of the want of authority which was urged on another ground. Will it be pretended that a committee of the Senate has not the power to act and report upon any legitimate subject of legislation, whether it has been referred to the committee specially by petition, memorial, or resolution, or not? The committees of the Senate derive their powers from the body creating them, and the Senate derives its powers from the Constitution, and can exercise them, independently of any petitions or resolutions coming from any quarter. I state this in relation to the naked power, and not with reference to its exercise. I admit, sir, that it is always the safe course in legislation for Congress to act in obedience to the will of the people, and not to step in advance of that will in hurried action. There are always subjects enough for the action of Congress which are legitimately knocking at the door of each House, without making it necessary for us to go in search of them. And, sir, by this principle, I am entirely willing to test the warrant for the action of the majority of the committee in reporting the bill before the Senate. On this point I have been, in some measure, anticipated by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. HENDERSON.] Still I shall call the attention of the Senate to the facts of the case, so far as the action of the committee was impelled by the petitions which were referred to it. Like the chairman of the committee, I have looked into the petitions; and I now state to the Senate that there has not been a single petition referred to the committee praying for a more efficient remedy in behalf of creditors. Without exception, they all ask for the passage of a bankrupt law for the relief of debtors. They all ask for just such a measure as the majority of the committee reported. There are one or two of them that speak of a law for the benefit of creditors as well as debtors, but not one of them asks for a compulsory bankrupt law, or for a law confined exclusively to traders. The most of the petitions, near one hundred in number, from different parts of the Union, speak the same language, and were evidently prepared in accordance with the views of the meeting of the citizens of New York, held at the Merchants' Exchange on the 27th of February last, at which the Mayor of the city, Isaac L. Varian, presided. These proceedings, with the circular of the corresponding committee, give us the grounds of the application for a bankrupt law. I would send them to the Clerk to be read, but I dislike to take up so much of the time of the Senate as the reading of the whole proceedings would occupy. I will, however, read from my place so much of the circular as is directly in point, as it speaks substantially the language of the whole of them, except one from Mississippi, which includes banks. The circular, after some preliminary remarks, says:

"The enactment of a general bankrupt law by Congress is warmly advocated, not only by those who have suffered in consequence of the general derangement of all branches of business throughout the country, and who find such a law necessary for their own relief, but also by a large majority of our most respectable merchants and heavy capitalists, who are fully convinced of its justice and utility; in fact, all classes of the community are deeply interested in this measure, and look to it as the only means by which a large body of our most meritorious, intelligent, and enterprising fellow-citizens can be extricated from embarrassments which the keenest vigilance could not have foreseen, nor the strictest prudence have prevented. There are many in every section of the country who possess the highest qualifications for business, and who are industrious and frugal in their habits, and have the strongest desire to exert themselves in useful and honorable pursuits, but who are depressed, and whose families are made to suffer from the existence of debts which it is absolutely impossible for them ever to pay, and from which State laws or State institutions can never release them.

"A bankrupt law for the relief of this portion of our fellow-citizens is most imperatively demanded by every consideration of justice, propriety, and humanity, and would operate greatly to the advantage of the country at large, by reviving its business and commercial enterprise, in bringing once more into active and successful operation the latent energy, skill, and experience of intelligent and industrious men, who have been prostrated by misfortunes, and who look to this source alone for aid. There is no reason or philosophy in a state of things which irrevocably fastens upon men and their families the consequences of misfortunes that do not result from frauds or from criminal acts or intentions, and which the exercise of ordinary prudence and care would not have prevented; and we hold it to be most palpably unjust and absurd that the citizens of an enlightened Republic should be subjected to imprisonment, or be confined within the limits of a single State, and remain liable to every dollar they can earn to be taken from them, when they cannot be justly charged with crime, fraud, or dishonor."

Such, sir, is the language of the circular on which the petitions are founded. There is not a word or hint in one of them that a bankrupt law is called for to aid the creditor in the collection of his debts. All speak one language, and that is, give relief to the debtor who is driven to the wall, who lies prostrate under his debts and the operation of the State laws.

If, then, the legitimate impetus to propel the committee in the discharge of its functions on this subject was either public opinion or the weight of petitions, can any one hesitate for a moment in saying that the majority of the committee reported the only bill they were justified in reporting, under the circumstances, that is, a bill to provide for voluntary bankruptcy? But we are told by the chairman of the committee (Mr. WALL) that this bill leaves the debtor at liberty, while it ties the hands of the creditor, and, therefore it is unjust, unconstitutional, and not authorized by the petitions. If the position assumed by the chairman was really the fact of the case, there would certainly be much more force in the objection; but is it so? The Senator would no doubt be correct, if there were neither State nor United States laws for the collection of debts, or if the bankrupt laws would repeal all other laws on that subject, neither of which, I presume, will be seriously contended for here. How, then, is the creditor tied hand and foot, as the Senator contends? Has he not the benefit of the United States and of the State laws to coerce the payment of his claims against his debtor? Is there any want of remedies to either drive the debtor to the wall, or to take from him all his means? It may be said that, in some States, laws have been passed abolishing imprisonment for debt; but let it be remembered that, in those States, the most efficient remedies are afforded to the creditor to enable him to make his claim out of the means of the debtor. In addition to all the common law remedies, there is the bill in chancery, that scrutinizing remedy which addresses the conscience of the debtor, and follows his property, effects, and credits, into whosesoever hands they may go for his use, tearing away in its march whatever badges of fraud may have been thrown around him, exposing the rights of the debtor to open day, and applying his effects to the benefit of the creditor. Does not the fact of the thousands of insolvent persons stripped of every means of support, who are lying prostrate, with all their energies paralyzed, attest in strong and conclusive terms the efficiency of the laws as they now exist, in extracting from debtors all their means for the benefit of their creditors? Were those laws defective in providing a remedy for the creditor, would not some petition ere this have reached the Senate, asking a more efficient remedy? Is it to be supposed that creditors would fold their arms and silently see an attempt made in Congress to give relief to the debtor class which would give that unfortunate class any advantage whatever?

Sir, I repeat, the creditor requires no additional remedy; so far as he is concerned, no bankrupt law is needed; all his rights are perfectly secure as the law stands, and he cannot be injured by the provisions of a voluntary bankrupt law, as he can come in under it, and receive his just dividend of the assets or estate of the bankrupt: and, in one respect, he will be benefited by such a law, and that is, he will be secured against preferences, as no discharge can take place when a preference has been given to any one creditor by the debtor, in anticipation of taking the benefit of the law—a provision that should be incorporated in every State insolvent law. I trust I have shown that the majority of committee reported the only bill called for by public opinion and the petitions referred to them, and that the opinion of the chairman, that the bill reported was not warranted by the Constitution or the petitions, is not sustained by the facts of the case; at least, such is my opinion,

I will now, Mr. President, proceed to sustain the statement I made, that the substitute reported by the Chairman, and now offered as an amendment to the bill before the Senate, is liable, in fact, to the prominent objections which have been urged against the bill.

The first objection which I take to the substitute is, that it provides for compulsory bankruptcy, or in other words, puts that extraordinary remedy into the hands of the creditor, which I have already attempted to show is neither required by the Constitution, called for by the people, sustained by public opinion, petitioned for by creditors, nor justified by the genius of our Government or the humanity of our citizens. It is a remedy that would only be resorted to by a malicious and unrelenting creditor, whose object was the disgrace and destruction of his debtor, rather than the collection of his debts. It would also put it in the power of such a creditor to draw the estate of his debtor into the Federal courts, and, through the process attending his bankruptcy, to swallow up in costs a large part of the estate. The proceedings in compulsory bankruptcy, and the powers granted to the creditor over the property and business of the debtor by such a law, are only adapted, if at all, to a state of society purely commercial, and can never be extended to the various classes of society. I should hesitate long before I could subject the citizens of my State to the operations of such a law. To suffer the creditor to seize upon the whole effects of the debtor, without judgment, and place them in the hands of trustees, arresting the power of the debtor over his estate, is a remedy of the most arbitrary character that the human mind can conceive of, and before it is attempted to be exercised by any Legislature, it should at least be shown conclusively that such a remedy was called for by the public; and even then it should be confined as much as possible in its application. Let me assure you, Mr. President, it is a remedy not suited either to the habits, business, or feelings of the Western people, who, though quite as solvent in the end as the citizens of other States, are not accustomed to pay always at the very day, as do merchants who deal with banks, where protest and disgrace follow either temporary suspension or inability to pay at the day. Therefore, as there was no petition presented from any quarter asking the passage of a compulsory bankrupt law, I feel sustained in the position I assumed, that such a law is uncalled for. I do not pretend that it would be unconstitutional, but I do insist that it is inexpedient, gratuitous, and impolitic, to pass it, and that, by connecting it with a subject which is loudly called for by every consideration of public policy, private justice, and individual sufferings, we endanger the passage of a bill which I believe the most of us feel disposed to sustain.

Mr. President, I must now ask the indulgence of the Senate, while I proceed to examine the main objection to be proposed substitute; I refer to the provision extending the compulsory bankrupt principle so as to include State corporations for banking and other purposes. I candidly declare to you, in the outset, that I view that provision as asserting the most alarming and tremendous Federal powers which have ever been attempted to be exercised since the adoption of the Constitution; powers which, if legitimate, at once dissipate all our fondly cherished notions of State sovereignty and the the sacredness of State institutions; powers which I shall attempt to show, if carried to their ultimatum, swallow up and engulf within their tremendous vortex every vestige of State rights, and change the entire nature of the Government. I confess, sir, I did not believe that any person who had ever examined the structure of this Federal Government could be brought to sustain the tremendous powers claimed in this instance. What are these powers? Nothing short of bringing the State banks, through the medium of a compulsory bankrupt law, within the control and jurisdiction of the Federal Government. The powers of creating corporations is one of the highest attributes of sovereignty; there are many here who honestly deny to Congress that power, and yet, strange to tell, the power is assumed of controlling the action of and striking down the corporations erected by the States within their undoubted constitutional powers. It is now too late to deny the power to the States of incorporating banks. It will not be assumed by any that Congress possesses the power of incorporating State banks at least, whatever may be the opinion in relation to the power to incorporate a United States Bank. The State banks, then, being the creatures of the States, and possessing a portion of their sovereignty, must, in the very nature of things, be subject alone to the control of the Governments that created them. The powers of the State and Federal Governments, I admit, are, in some instances, concurrent; in those cases they may be carried out; but I know of no conflicting powers. Such powers cannot exist; the one must control the other; the weaker would have to surrender to the more powerful; the particular State, being the weaker, would be compelled to surrender to the Federal, the stronger power. A power in the States to erect corporations, and a power in the Federal Government to pull them down, cannot exist at the same time. Such is not this Government, or the relations of the powers conferred by the Federal and State Constitutions.

Sir, I was present during the discussion in this body of the bill prohibiting the United States Bank of Pennsylvania from reissuing the notes of the late Bank of the United States. I well recollect the ground upon which the power of this Goverrment over that subject was placed. I took no part in that discussion, as I always speak here with reluctance, unless I am called upon by my position and relation to the subject. But, sir, the argument is fresh is my mind; the advocates of that law placed the subject on the ground that the United States Bank of Pennsylvania having received the consideration, and entered into a contract with the Secretary of the Treasury to take up and cancel the outstanding notes of the late Bank of the United States, had assumed the character of a trustee to the Government, and, as such trustee, Congress had the power to enforce the execution of the trust by penal enactments. The exercise of Federal powers to that extent was much questioned and denied by many. But there was no Senator who set up the pretence, now arguendo, that the federal power could at all control or touch that State institution in her character of a State bank; it was only by giving her the character of a trustee, and assuming the power over her in that character, that the power to control her action, so far as to prohibit her from the reissue, was claimed and exercised. I ask Senators who took part in that discussion to reconcile the provisions of the substitute before the Senate, including within the provisions of a compulsory bankrupt law, the State banks with their views at that time of the constitutional powers of the Federal Government. But, sir, how are Senators, who deny the power of the Federal Government to incorporate a National Bank, to sustain the power to pull down and destroy those erected by the States with ample powers to create them? I confess there is such a conflict in opinion here that I am unwilling to believe that a single Senator, giving that construction to the Federal Constitution, can be found maintaining the powers claimed in this substitute.

Sir, the chairman of the committee seemed to be apprized of these constitutional objections to the substitute, and, by way of providing for a retreat from the position, he included in the bill a proviso that the provisions of the bill should not apply to any corporation without the assent of the particular State; or, in other words, that the State in which any bank might be situated should have the power to provide that the acts which the substitute declares to be acts of bankruptcy should not be so considered, leaving each State to say whether the provisions of the bill should or should not include her banks. Here is an attempt to get rid of a constitutional objection by indirection. The powers conferred on the Federal Government are constitutional and not conventional. They are derived from the Constitution itself, and not from conventions with the States. The specified powers in the Constitution can neither be circumscribed nor enlarged by any convention with the States. Such a doctrine would be to authorize an amendment of the Constitution in a manner different from that pointed out in the instrument itself, and, instead of requiring two-thirds of the States to consent to the amendment, the consent of one State would be sufficient so far as related to that State, while you would have a different Constitution for each State, and not a Consitution for the United States.

But, sir, if such a convention could constitutionally be entered into, it would make the bill unconstitutional on the ground of a want of uniformity, as the law would operate unequally, and not uniformly. Some of the States would exempt all their banks, some would exempt part, and others would exempt none, from the operations of this law. And you would have a law operating differently in the several States, which would be clearly violatory of the constitutional provision authorizing Congress to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy, the meaning of which I have already stated is, that the laws passed on the subject shall be uniform in every State over the subjects they embrace. Sir, the Federal Government either has or has not the power over the subject. If she has not the power, as I contend, no partial or total reservation to a particular State can give it. If she has the constitutional power over these State institutions, it cannot be defeated or paralyzed by the dissent of the particular State. It is ample, if it exists. If it does not exist, it cannot be conferred except by and through the means pointed out in the Constitution—an amendment conferring the power.

Sir, it has been said that the substitute exercises the power over these institutions, on the principle that they are traders. Surely it will not be contended that they can be considered actual traders. Technically speaking, they cannot be considered buyers and sellers, dealers in merchandise. Is that character to be derived from the fact that they loan money, discount bills and notes, and deal in exchanges? The character of traders was never given to individuals or companies thus engaged. If you can make a trader out of a State bank upon these facts, you may also extend the term to the States, and even to the United States. They also issue their notes, purchase specie, produce, and other articles, and are dealers to as great extent as the State corporations. It will not be contended, then, that the banks are actual traders. But it may be said that they are constructive traders, or, in other words, that Congress has the power to declare who shall be considered traders for the purposes of the bill. I do not controvert that position in relation to persons within the constitutional powers of Congress; but it would be a monstrous stretch of power to assume jurisdiction over the States or their institutions, by giving to them a quality or character which you give persons over which the Constitution gives you jurisdiction. If such a doctrine could be maintained for a moment, your power would be without limitation, for it would be only necessary for you to declare the character and exercise the jurisdiction to any extent within your discretion. It is said that it is the first step that costs. So in relation to these exercises of Federal powers. If the Federal Government can take jurisdiction over the State banks by declaring them traders, and making one act an act of bankruptcy, she may, by the same exercise of power, declare any other act one of bankruptcy, until she may paralyze and destroy the institution entirely. If she can step over the threshold of the rights of the States, she can march up to the citadel. The power necessary to enable her to make the first step carries her triumphantly over every obstacle that may be thrown in her way by the States, until the last appearance of State institutions shall lie prostrate, and every vestige of State rights shall be swallowed up in the ingulfing vortex of Federal powers.

I will now, Mr. President, ask the attention of the Senate to the expediency of the proposed measure, even admitting that the Constitution presented no obstacle to the passage of such a law. And here let me say, that I view this as another attempt to destroy the remaining paper currency of the country, to drive or force the people to an exclusive metallic currency, to cut down the last of the issues. The power of the Government to create a National Bank was denied, and that institution was not renewed. The States incorporated banks; the power to do so was not questioned. But you now desire to destroy them also. You now propose to declare certain acts that may be done or omitted by those State institutions acts of bankruptcy. And what then? You propose to authorize any creditor to whom the bank may owe five hundred dollars, to seize, under the bankrupt law, upon the effects and franchises of the bank to place the whole under the custody of the Federal power, to arrest the further action of the institution, and to wind up the concern. Sir, what would be the effect of the exercise of this power? Let Senators think of it; let them figure to themselves a bank with an issue of half a million of dollars, suddenly arrested in its business by the operatton of the compulsory bankrupt law; it means, its debts, and its charter, all taken possession of by the trustees appointed by the Federal power. No matter who may be the stockholders, no matter what may be the interest of the State in the institution, the whole is at once paralyzed and stricken down at the instance of a single creditor; and who is to benefited by the operation? Not the creditors. for they will be compelled to await the tardy operation of the law to receive the dividends that the trustees may suffer to pass through their hands; for it is only speaking experience in anticipation to say that much of the amount will stick in the hands of the trustees, and never find its way to the pockets of the creditors; nor the public, for the people are interested in maintaining the value at least of the issues in circulation. Let me suppose that the issues of a bank, as I have said, are half a million, and the process of bankruptcy is applied to them; what would be the effect on the notes in circulation? Does not every Senator see at once that it would depreciate them more than one-half to the holder, and by the single operation in a single bank the people would lose a quarter of a million of dollars? And so in relation to the issues in all cases where the bank shall be thus acted upon. And upon whom, let me ask, would this loss fall? Not on the banks, but, on the contrary, it would put it in the power of the directors to buy up the notes at a discount, and make money by the operation. Not on those persons who have received bank accommodations, for they are the last persons who keep the notes in their possession, but on the business men of the country, the farmer, the mechanic, and the laborer, in whose hands the note would be. What, let me ask, would be the effect of such measure on the operation of the banks themselves? On all the banks south of New York that have suspended payment the bill would apply at once in all its rigor; they would be required to resume forthwith, or be liable to the provisions of the substitute; they would, therefore, be compelled to stop their discounts, and to press at once upon their debtors, and to require them to pay up in specie, in order to escape from the terrors of the measure. And upon whom would this pressure fall? Most certainly on the debtor class; the very class we desire to relieve by a bankrupt law. The consequence, therefore, of enacting the substi stute is relation to banks would be to make subjects without number for the other section of the bill to operate upon; for there never was a greater political error than that into which gentlemen have fallen in their crusade against the banks, in presuming that the banks alone are interested in their own fate; that you can oppress and drive the banks to the wall without affecting business and distressing their debtors in the same ratio. I have no special partiality for banks. I would sustain them no further than as they are useful instruments in the hands of the people in furthering their interests. I am aware that it is usual to charge every bank with the impropriety of suspending specie payments, and the charge is made as if the bank alone was to blame, when the truth is, a suspension is almost universally made to relieve and save the debters of the institution. There is, in general, not a dollar of paper issued without the creation of an equal amount of debts to the bank; hence, were a bank to force its debtors to discharge their dues in specie every ninety days, it could never be necessary to suspend payments. Sir, I repeat, in all sincerity, that those who are tilting against the banks are running at the shadow—the debtors of the institution are the substance they hit. The other classes of banks that might be affected are those which are exempt at this time; but how easy would it be for the Government to collect the paper of any obnoxious bank, make a run upon it, compel it either to suspend or ruin its debtors, and then seize upon its effects by the bankrupt law proposed by the substitute. And the mere knowledge that the Government had the power would be well calculated to induce even those banks to curtail their discounts still further, in order to prepare for such a crisis. And here let me ask Senators whether they think it would be good policy to risk these consequences merely for the purpose of grasping at a power which all admit to be doubtful, and which many believe to be unconstitutional. The consequences will be too serious to the country, now overwhelmed with embarrassment and distress, to sport with such a subject; and we know the States have full power over it. Let us leave it there. While Congress did nothing more than scold at the States and their institutions, as in the case of the resolutions of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY,] nothing very alarming was to be apprehended. Though I could not see the propriety of that movement, still it was rather harmless, as it did not act affirmatively. Its legal and moral force was not of a character to suspend the action of either the States or their institutions, and consequently the States looked on with indifference. But you are now about to take a step which will be seen and felt, and which will produce consequenses which we shall all deplore.

Mr. President, the petitions on our table ask for relief to the unfortunate. Shall we, in granting that relief, create greater misfortunes by compelling the banks to drive to destruction and sacrifice the property of the thousands and tens of thousands who could not at this time discharge their debts without utter ruin? I support this measure, sir, on no such grounds. I support it as a relief measure, called for by the condition of a large and respectable class of my fellow-citizens, as a measure demanded by all the considerations of justice and humanity. We have seen that Congress alone has the power to grant relief; we have the only remedy that can heal the patient; we hold the only key that can unlock the prison door and restore the unfortunate inmate to liberty and society. Shall we then turn a deaf ear to the voice of humanity. I honestly confess to you, sir, that I hold it to be one of the most fortunate circumstances of my life that I am afforded the opportunity of bearing an humble part in producing the general jubilee which will follow the passage of this bill; and let me, in conclusion, implore Senators not to embarrass the great object of the bill, the relief of unfortunate human beings, by connecting with it other matters of a questionable character. Let us rise above the atmosphere of party, and join heart and hand in knocking the chains from the unfortunate victims of arbitrary laws, and we shall receive the approval of our own consciences, while the prayers of thousands will ascend up to Heaven for our prosperity and happiness.

REMARKS OF MR. CLAYTON,

Debate in the Senate, Tuesday, May 12, 1840—On the substitute proposed by Mr. WALL for the bill to establish a uniform system of Bankruptcy.

Mr. CLAYTON said he would confine his observations strictly to the matter immediately under discussion. He would not depart from it. The wide field which might be opened on the general discussion of a bankrupt law he would leave to others who had better health and more strength to go through with it. He would merely make a few remarks on that part of the bill which the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. WALL) proposed as a substitute for the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which embraced in it corporations.

The substitute provides for the case of voluntary bankruptcy, as the bill before the Senate does. It provides, also, for the case of involuntary or compulsory bankruptcy of natural persons, and it embraces the bankruptcy of corporations. To the first he gave his most hearty assent, and to the second he would also cheerfully give his support if it were brought forward disconnected with the others. To the third he had insuperable objections, which he would proceed to lay before the Senate.

Before he proceeded, however, he must state his deep regret that all these subjects were united in one bill. They were not necessarily connected with or dependent on each other. Congress had a right to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States. Separating the three subjects into three bills he thought by far the most fit method of proceeding. Then each would stand on its own merits, not to be supported or pulled down by the others. For voluntary bankruptcy the country was clamorous. The disastrous times upon which we had fallen had made it more immediately necessary than the others; and as it was less objectionable to many, he hoped it might be permitted to share its fate by itself.

To that part of the bill embracing the bankruptcy of corporations he would now proceed to state his objections. He did not believe that corporations were in the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution when they gave to Congress power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies. They had never been, and have never been, embraced in any bankrupt law. The law deems the bankrupt criminal; it treats him as such. For any fraudulent concealment of his effects he was formerly punished capitally by death. Such was the law at the adoption of the Constitution. A corporation cannot be punished criminally. You cannot arrest or imprison it. It is an artificial, ideal, intangible person existing only in fiction of law. It has no soul to be saved, nor body to be punished. You cannot examine it; it has no conscience to be effected; its seal is its oath; and it is not therefore a fit object of a bankrupt law.

A decree has gone forth that the banks are to be destroyed, and this bill is to execute that decree. A more alarming and tremendous power was never grasped at by Congress; and a means more effectual to accomplish the purposes could not be devised. This may be desired; but, for proof, he referred to the President's message, written by the same man who, in 1827, denied in his place here the constitutionality of such a law; to the thundering denunciations which have been heard from various quarters of the Senate at the present session; to the papers acting in concert with the Administration; to a tirade pronounced the other day by the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. BROWN) against the banks, in which he accused them with associating with the Opposition to pull down the Administration, and in which he denounced the Opposition press as a "bank-bought" press; and to the bill itself. The fanaticism of party was very like fanaticism in religion; always ready to go to extremes to accomplish its objects; reckless of consequences, and of the hopeless ruin it may bring upon others. Each had its own mode of salvation; and if it could not convert, it would destroy the unbeliever. He did not believe that gentlemen had reflected upon the extent of the evil which they were about to inflict upon the country. He hoped they would pause and still reflect. They were treading on unsafe and dangerous ground; and thousands upon thousands of ruined men will rise up and charge them with their ruin.

If Congress subjects corporations to bankruptcy, it interferes with the rights of the States. The States have the power to create corporations—no one denies this; and may control and fashion them as they please, without the intermeddling of Congress. But assume the power which is now contended for, and corporations will no longer be under the control of the States. Congress will have gained a power of the most alarming character; it will have gained a strong and sure foundation upon which to rest the fulcrum, and it will be easy afterwards to extend the lever to any length which may be necessary to enable it to uproot every corporation in the country; but if it may not be desirable to go that far, it will give to Congress that entire regulation and management of all corporations. Usurpation in pursuit of power is usually cautious and circumspect. Its approaches are not made boldly, with a frank avowal of its designs. It conceals its purposes, and step by step, and little by little, it effects its purpose; when, if the magnitude of its ultimate object were foreseen, it would be frustrated by the alarm and resistance which it would necessarily excite. Congress, by the amendment proposed, assumes the power of declaring corporations bankrupt; or, in other words, (for, after all, no other corporations are at this time cared for,) to declare bankrupt all the banks in the country. The amendment declares that "all corporations, or associations for manufacturing, commercial, insurance, or trading purposes, owing debts to the amount of and all persons, corporations, or associations of persons, who shall issue, pay out, or emit bills, drafts, or obligations with the design that they shall circulate instead of, or as a substitute for money, shall be deemed traders and liable to become bankrupts within the true intent and meaning of this act, and may, upon petition of one or more of their creditors, to whom they owe debts amounting, in the whole, to not less than five hundred dollars, to the appropriate court, be so declared accordingly in the following cases, to wit: whenever such corporations or associations for manufacturing, insurance, or trading purposes have already failed in business, suspended, or stopped payment, for the period of one month, or declared or acknowledged themselves to be insolvent, or shall hereafter fail in business, suspend or stop payment for the space of fifteen days, or declare or acknowledge themselves to be insolvent, or unable to pay their debts or engagements." Concede this power to Congress, and no "destructive" could devise one more ample over every banking institution in the country. All will concede that, if you have the power to declare any one act done by an incorporated bank to be an act of bankruptcy, you may declare any other act committed by it to be an act of bankruptcy, for which it will be liable to be proceeded against in bankruptcy. And although in the infancy of your power, and for the purpose of securing it without much alarm, you may, for the present, be content with declaring as causes of bankruptcy the failure in business, or the stopping of payment by a bank, what shall prevent you in future, if you deem it expedient, to go just as far as you please? If on gress should imagine that the safety of the note-holders should require that the amount of issues should be limited, for instance, by the amount of specie on hand, what shall hinder them from declaring any excess of issues beyond the specie in the vaults, at any time, to be an act of bankruptcy? for it may be said that, in such a case, there is clear proof that the bank is unable to meet its engagements; because, if all its notes were presented for payment at once, it could not discharge them. Plausible reasons enough may be assigned. A hue and cry may be raised of overissues, overtrading, and a design to defraud the Public; and, under the pretext of sheltering the Public from fraud, Congress may, in this respect, limit and control all the banks in the country. Or, suppose that Congress, in its wisdom, should think that no bank ought to make a dividend beyond five, or even six per cent., beause, if a bank should make a greater dividend, it might be said to be evidence of a design to divide its capital among its stockholders in fraud of the Public, and this may also be declared to be an act of bankruptcy. Having once gained this power over banks, there is no limit to it but the will of Congress; and these institutions, which have heretofore been exclusively the creatures of State legislation, as they rightfully have been, will become the mere creatures of Congress, subject to its discretion, to be moulded and shaped and fashioned at its will. Mr. C. said he had never been the noisy champion of State rights, yet he hoped he was as willing to protect those rights as any one; but if there be any politician here of that school who is willing to vote for this amendment, he has a stronger stomach and greater powers of digestion than he supposed any one to have. But are these political dogmas really entertained or not? Heaven knew that he had sometimes doubted, and thought they were used only as tubs thrown out to amuse the great Southern whale. Witness a late vote in another place on the New Jersey election.

There is no necessity, as in the case of natural persons, that Congress should interfere in this matter. The States have ample and complete power. If Congress possessed the power, it would be ungracious and unnecessary to exercise it: for it is not needed, as in the case of individuals. Over insolvency the States, within their own limits, have complete control. They can free the person from arrest, but they cannot discharge him from his debts. Congress only can do this. It has been denied to the States by the Constitution; and hence the necessity of a bankrupt law by Congress. Now, how can a bankrupt law, in this respect, apply to corporations? The two great objects of a bankrupt law are, 1st. To secure the property of the bankrupt for the benefit of his creditors; and, 2d. To discharge the debtor from his debts when he has made a full and fair surrender of all his effects in payment of his debts, as far as they will go, leaving him free from arrest, and in the undisturbed enjoyment of all his future acquisitions, and the full benefit of his own industry and labor. In regard to the first, the States have as ample power as Congress. They can compel the surrender of property by all the means, and by every process, and by every species of punishment that Congress can employ. Such are already the insolvent laws of the States. But, in regard to the second, when it is applied to a natural person, we can understand its benefits very well. His person becomes free, he is discharged from his debts, and his future gains are his own. No one can disturb him in either; but, when applied to a corporation, it is senseless. It has no body to be arrested; it can have no future gains to be secured from seizure by inexorable creditors, and it need not, and ought not, to be discharged from its debts. When bankrupt, its life is extinct, and it can have neither future gains nor existence. Its capital, its life-blood, is gone, and it ceases to be. It is not, then, the proper subject of bankruptcy. The Constitution did not design to confer a concurrent power upon Congress which could be equally exercised, and to the same beneficial extent, by the States. It only intended that Congress should act when the States could not.

It needs not, then, the aid of Congress effectually to accomplish every thing that may be desirable on this subject. In the case of individuals, to effect all that a bankrupt law can effect, it is necessary that Congress should act, because the Constitution of the United States has confided the power to Congress, and denied it to the States. But over the bankruptcy, or rather the insolvency, of corporations, the States have ample power, and ought to have undisputed control. After the States, by their own process, and by such regulations as they may choose to make, have drained the last dollar from the banks in payment of their debts; when these creatures of their own formation have ceased to be, what need is there of any act of Congress to set them upon their legs again, to secure to them the future fruits of their industry, and free them from arrest? The notion is idle; it is worse; it is an attempt to meddle with what belongs to the States only. They have the right to make them, and they ought to have the right to manage them according to their own good will and pleasure.

It will be seen from the clause of the bill just read that every bank which has already suspended or stopped payment for the space of one month is liable to be proceeded against in bankruptcy; and every one knows that when an act of bankruptcy is once committed, it is the unpardonable sin, which cannot be redeemed or remitted. No act, no redress, no penitence, can save or purge it of the foul stain. Every bank, from New York to Florida, is at the mercy of him who may choose to proceed against it. All have suspended or stopped payment. Have gentlemen looked to the catastrophe which must necessarily result from this state of things? Have they looked to the wide-spread ruin and disaster which must follow? Proceedings are instituted; decrees are obtained; assignees are appointed; they take possession of the assets, and proceed, according to the direction of the bill, as speedily as practicable, to collect the debts. Has any one figured to himself the vast amount of debts thus to be collected? Let him make the estimate; let him estimate the misery, distress, and sorrow, the utter overthrow of the hopes of thousands, the prostration of all business and industry, spreading poverty far and wide, and then balance all this against—what? An equivalent, if equivalent there can be? No. To gain a new, and, at best, a doubtful political power, which cannot be used for any good purpose, but may be used for the worst of purposes. The gentleman has, however, very kindly provided in his proposed amendment, that when the bank is authorized by its charter, or by any express law of the State, to do or commit the act therein declared to be an act of bankruptcy, or when, by any such law, it is or may be exempted from the provisions of the amendment, then the law which we are about to pass shall not apply to such bank. This is very considerate, indeed; for he who drew the charter, or any of those express laws heretofore enacted, must have been a far-seeing man who could have foreseen this amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, and provided beforehand against it. How many banks do you suppose there are whose charters authorize them to "commit the act" forbidden by the amendment, or who are expressly authorized by law to do it? He deemed there were very few. In the State which he represents, not one. It is true the banks are liable to pay a heavy interest if the notes are not paid on demand at the counter; but, to the credit of the people, no one has sought to enforce the payment of the penalty, because they know very well that the banks would resume payment to-morrow if there neighbors were to do it; and, without this, that it would be folly in them to attempt it. He apprehended there were few charters which authorized at all the suspension of specie payment; still fewer which authorized the suspension for the length of time which many banks have suspended; and he doubted if, in any case, the law of the State expressly authorized any bank "to do or commit" the forbidden act of bankruptcy. What are the terms of the amendment? Why, that any corporation which shall have already failed in business, suspended, or stopped payment for the period of one month, or declared or acknowledged itself to be insolvent, or unable to pay its debts or other engagements, is declared to have committed an act of bankruptcy. Is it probable that any Legislature would by express law authorize the doing or committing of many of these several acts of bankruptcy? And yet they are enumerated as distinct acts of bankruptcy, which the gentleman from New Jersey supposes may have been expressly authorized by law.

Mr. C. said he had pretty attentively observed the proceedings of the Pennsylvania Legislature at its last session in relation to the banks in that State. He had remarked that various propositions were made, the object of which was to compel the banks to resume specie payment; but he thought none was made expressly to authorize a suspension of payment; and the act which was finally passed, if his memory was correct, was in its nature compulsory upon the banks to resume the payment of their notes by the 15th of January, 1841, or that their charters should be forfeited. If there was any authority here given to suspend until that time, it was not expressly given, but only by implication and inference; and all the banks in that State will be liable, the moment this law passes, to be declared bankrupt.

Under what pretext is it urged that corporations shall be included in the system of bankruptcy which we are about to establish? Is it feared that the banks are likely to fail, so that their creditors, or those holding their notes, or having money in deposite, will ultimately not receive the last dollar in payment? Those who trust the banks know better, and they do not ask your assistance. No one, in regard to the banks on the seaboard, fears any thing. Their notes at present answer all the purposes of money. No one refuses them; all are glad to get them. Why take them from circulation? For, as sure as this bill passes, they will circulate no longer. Trade and industry will be at a stand. If proceedings are not immediately taken against the banks under this act, they will immediately commence the most rigorous collection of their debts in self-defence. No option will be left them; they will be obliged to resort to the most harsh and unrelenting means to save themselves. All the money in circulation will be absorbed, and flow into the banks; none will be left with the people. But suppose proceedings are taken against the banks, decrees are obtained declaring them bankrupt, and assignees appointed to seize upon, and administer their effects, and what will then be the consequence? The same system of rigorous collection, only to a greater extent; and to this will be added a great depreciation in the paper. The moment the decree in bankruptcy is passed, all confidence will be lost, and justly too, for he who holds a note must wait the slow and tedious progress of the commission. Every holder of a note must appear before the commissioner, or, as he is called in the amendment, master in chancery, and prove his debt, and then await the slow progress of affairs to receive his dividends. In this state of things, what would be the value of the notes to their present holders? What would not their depreciation be? A more frightful condition of things could not be imagined; all business would be at a stand. Notes would no longer circulate as money. They would be commodities to be bought and sold in the market, as any other merchandise, greatly below their nominal or even real value. They would all fall into the hands of moneyed men, who would speculate upon them at the lowest price. And the very evil which gentlemen are so anxious to guard against (the depreciation of paper money) would be increased tenfold; not a very uncommon consequence of unguarded legislation. Let not gentlemen deceive themselves by the supposition that the notes will be kept up to something like their value by being sought after by the debtors of the banks to pay their debts with. Recollect that this is not the case of a bank settling up its own affairs, in which the debtor may set off any of its notes which he may have, no matter at what time he may have received them. But here all the property of the bankrupt passes to the assignee by the decree in bankruptcy. The debts due to the bankrupt from that moment become his, to be collected, and distributed equally among all the creditors. Notes purchased afterwards cannot be set off; and hence purchases for that purpose can give them no increased value.

To this catalogue of evils may be added the great depreciation in the value of the property of many innocent stockholders, not bank barons, but persons almost wholly dependant upon these stocks for their subsistence, widows and orphans, and persons in humble life, whose all is invested in these institutions. That all will be greatly diminished, and during the progress of the commission in bankruptcy, their only means of subsistence will be withdrawn from them entirely.

It may be doubted whether any one seriously believes that the banks south of New York have been influenced by considerations of their own interest in stopping payment. There is no doubt that if they had disregarded the interest of their debtors, and of the people generally, they might at any time, within sixty days after they first stopped, have resumed payment. But what infinite distress would not the means necessary to be resorted to, to effect this purpose, have produced? Indeed, they needed not to have stopped at all if they had disregarded the interest of the public. They chose to sustain the odium so liberally and so unkindly cast upon them, rather than crush the communities around them. They have received little thanks, while the public have reaped all the benefits. Contrast the prosperity and business of Philadelphia with New York. While New York has the barren honor of paying specie, Philadelphia is doing all the business.

It is impossible to estimate, if the banks are embraced in the law, the vast amount of property and business that will be thrown into the courts of the United States. Some of the banks have a capital of many millions. All these vast sums are to go into the hands of assignees. Is there not some danger that many of them may play the tricks of nimble-footed sub-treasurers, run off with the assets, and leave the creditors in a worse situation than if the banks were let alone? What is to prevent it? The temptation will be very great, and they will have examples enough before them.

The gentleman from New Jersey had objected to the bill reported by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, because, in his opinion, it did not establish a uniform system of bankruptcy. He has not told us what he understands by the phrase uniform system. Mr. C. thought the meaning was very obvious, and it could have but one meaning. The purpose for which the power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States was confided to Congress by the Constitution was very apparent. It was highly important that this power should be vested in the National Legislature, so that the certificate of the bankrupt should avail him in all parts of the Union. The States cannot legislate extra-territorially. The certificate therefore would only protect him in the State where it was granted; and the moment he left it, his person and his property would be liable to be seized by his creditors. There is no obligation of positive law which would compel the courts of one State to respect the certificate granted in another. The courtesy of nations might induce the courts of some of the States to respect the certificate, and give efficacy to it, while others would not do so, as is the case at present with the insolvent laws of the several States. Pennsylvania and Delaware mutually respect the certificates granted by each other, while New York refuses. No uniform system could therefore be expected from the legislation of the several States, in which all would be mutually and equally benefited. It therefore became necessary that this power should be vested in Congress; and, from that fact alone, it would result that the system should be uniform throughout the United States; and that what might be law in one State would necessarily be law throughout the whole country. No matter upon what class of persons it might operate, it would operate upon that class every where. In regard to natural persons, he had no idea that the power of Congress was circumscribed in the slighest degree by the Constitution; he knew that a notion prevailed with some gentlemen that Congress, in declaring who should be bankrupts, was limited to those classes of persons designated by the British statutes existing at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. Such was not his opinion. Such a construction was needless, and without reason—at least without good reason. The statutes 34 Hen. 8th, and 13th Elizabeth, particularly the latter statute, laid the foundation of all the law which prevailed in England from that time to what is called the consolidated statute of 6 Geo. 4th. In the mean time, various alterations were made by intermediate statutes; and, he believed, still further by the liberal construction given to them by the courts. And it seems strange that we should be confined in our interpretation of the term "bankruptcies," as used in the Constitution, to the precise meaning which may have been given to it by a British statute of the reign of Elizabeth, or of any subsequent reign; that we were not to accommodate our law, and suit it to the progress of society and the arts, and the multiplication of the pursuits and exigencies of men; and that, while all else was advancing around us, in this respect alone we should remain stationary. Such could not be the true interpretation of the Constitution. Any law which embraces any number of classes or persons, whether that number be few or many, if it operates alike throughout the whole country, is a uniform law on the subject of bankruptcies. How far, how very far, is the system proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey from being a uniform system. It is the very reverse. It gives to the several States the power to alter, to amend, or even to repeal it, so far as it may affect any particular State; so that the law will operate in as many varieties of ways as the State have different interests. In no two States will it operate alike, unless the Legislatures of all the States shall be immediately convened after it passes, and it be repealed by them all; an event by no means improbable. Instead of this being a uniform system, it should be called a system of varieties. His bill, therefore, was liable to his own charge of want of uniformity, to as great an extent as possible: while the bill reported by the committee was liable to no such charge. Its provisions extended to every part of the Union alike. It operated every where in the same way, and upon the same persons and classes of persons. In truth, it provided for every man and woman who was so unfortunate as to need its relief. He did not entirely understand the gentleman, although he had said a good deal on the subject, when he spoke of contracts being the peculiar subjects of a bankrupt law, or the necessity that both the parties, debtor and creditor, should be at liberty to become the actors in the proceedings in bankruptcy. Congress has the power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States, and whatever classes of persons they may deem it fit to designate as proper subjects of bankruptcy, they may so enact; carefully providing that the law shall operate every where alike—the same in Maine as in Georgia, without regarding who may be the agent, whether debtor or creditor, in procuring the decree in bankruptcy; such a law would be uniform in its operations. But the substitute proposed is, clearly, for want of this necessary uniformity, unconstitutional.

SPEECH OF MR. HAND,

OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, June 27, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on the Independent Treasury bill:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I hope the importance of the subject before us, warrants me in detaining the committee a short time, in giving the reasons for my vote. I am fully aware of the impatience of many to occupy the floor for the same purpose, and shall therefore enter at once upon the subject, without prefatory circumlocution, or attempt at display. I do so, too, from necessity; for although I have felt the glow, kindled by the power of some gentlemen who have addressed this committee, I, pretend to no such powers; and were it otherwise, I have felt how deep may be the impression of eloquence upon the feelings, without convincing the judgment, which alone should be the object of speaking here.

The simple question before us is, what is the best mode for the receipt, custody, and disbursement of the public money. This is said to open the whole questions of political economy, and of the currency. That it may affect the latter, I do not deny; but that questions of currency are legitimately within our jurisdiction, I doubt, for reasons which I shall give in closing my remarks. But so the subject has been handled before this committee, and therefore I feel compelled to advert to it.

The opponents of this great measure, however, start a preliminary objection. They put in what would be professionally called, a "dilatory plea." They insist that the subject should be pretermitted for the present, that the people, at the approaching election, may approve or reject it. Sir, the people have passed upon this measure, and we are here, as their agents, to carry out their expressed will. But the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] says, the people were "decoyed." This sir, is the old cry, and underrates the sense of that people. The gentleman is mistaken. A majority of the people, after their pre-elected servants had twice rejected this measure, deliberately and understandingly approved it.

Here, perhaps, it is proper for a moment, to advert to the resolutions, or quasi instructions of the Legislature of my own State, on this subject, which I now hold in my hand. My colleague, [Mr. STRONG,] has left me little to say here. While I desire to treat that Legislature with all due respect, and while I subscribe to the right of the constituent to instruct the Representative, I must dissent from the reasoning, as well as the conclusions, found in these resolutions. Their premises, with other objections, will be matter of argument before I resume my seat. But the conclusions put forth by that body, that I shall "conform my acts and votes to the expressed will and best interests of my constituents, by steadily and faithfully opposing this measure," and that "any Representative in Congress, who shall persist in advocating this project, and urging its adoption, will misrepresent the views, wishes, and interests of his constituents," are not justified by the facts. Sir, two out of three members of that body, from my district, were elected as friends of this measure; and this measure, too, at the time of my own election, was made a prominent, and a test question. I should be recreant to every representative duty were I to disobey such instructions.

One word more, and then I have done with this unpleasant matter. A majority of that body are pleased to say, that in persisting to advocate this project, and urging its adoption, my "conduct will merit and receive their unqualified disapprobation." Sir, I am sent here to advocate this measure, by those who gave me this seat. To my constituents alone, and not to others, am I amenable. By what authority, then, does that body declare, that in doing my plainest duty, I shall "merit" the disapprobation of those who have no supervision over my conduct? Do they not arrogate too much? How different this language from that of our Legislature in 1832, in advancing a somewhat antagonistic sentiment: "That it is the sentiment of this Legislature, that the charter of the Bank of the United States ought not to be renewed, and that our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representative respectfully requested, to vote against said renewal." Plain, simple, respectful, and direct. Sir, I freely admit that many of my intelligent constituents are opposed to this measure. They evinced that opposition at the polls when I was elected; but they would be the first to condemn a breach of faith in their Representative. But I hasten to the business before us.

The history of our currency, Mr. Chairman, is brief but eventful. The old Congress, December 31st, 1781, chartered the Bank of North America, which commenced operations 7th January, 1782. On the 25th of February, 1791, Congress chartered the Bank of the United States, with a capital of ten millions. This charter expired 4th of March 1811. On the 10th of April 1816, another United States Bank was chartered, for the term of twenty years, with a capital of thirty-five millions. The Legislatures of the States have also chartered many banks. In 1792, the aggregate capital of all the banks was about eighteen millions; in 1800, over thirty millions; in 1820, over one hundred and thirty millions; in 1840, over three hundred and fifty millions; and their number had increased to over nine hundred. In my own State this increase has also been progressive; in 1800, we had a capital of about three and a half millions; in 1810, seven and a half millions; 1820, twenty-one millions; 1830, twenty-four millions; 1840, over fifty-six millions.

Here I would remark, that, under the safety fund law, passed in 1829, which my colleague [Mr. HUNT] thinks evidence of Mr. Van Buren's hostility to the banks and business of the country, but one bank has failed, and by that the bill holders lose nothing; whereas, from 1819 to 1830, inclusive, nine banks, not under that system, failed in that State, with an aggregate capital of $2,650,000, and with almost total loss to the bill holders. I will add, too, that my colleague, in commenting on the distribution of bank stocks in that State, omitted to inform us, that while the Democratic party there held every branch of the Government, a law was passed requiring all stocks of newly chartered banks to be sold at auction. He omitted to state, too, when charging us as being the real bank party, that after the Democratic party had been defeated in that State, and an overwhelming majority of his own political friends returned to the popular branch of our Legislature, a free banking law was passed, by which the number of banks has been almost doubled, and some of them chartered thereby for the period of four thousand and fifty years; and that under that system some of the finest lands in the State have been mortgaged as capital for banking. He omitted to state, too, how his political friends voted on the questions of incorporating banks, when they were in a minority.

But I proceed. First, let us for a moment look at the changeable circulation of all our banks. From tables and reports, it appears that in 1815 their circulation was about forty-five millions. In 1816, sixty eight millions—twenty-three millions more. In 1820, it had settled back again to forty-five millions. In 1830, it amounted to sixty-one millions, and was up to ninety-five millions in 1834—an increase, in four years, of thirty-four millions. One year more added nine millions; another year added thirty-six millions; the next, nine millions more; making it then (1837) the enormous amount of one hundred and forty-nine millions. In 1838, down to one hundred and sixteen millions—a falling off of thirty-three millions. In 1839, up to one hundred and thirty-four millions; now down to one hundred and six millions—a falling off of twenty-eight millions, and probably still falling, for obvious reasons. That of the Bank of the United States has been equally variable. It took the lead in the decrease of circulation, and its successor, in 1837, decreased its circulation from twenty-three millions to seven millions—a difference of sixteen millions. In the State of New York, the circulation of the banks, other than those under the recent general banking law, was twenty-four millions in 1837, twelve millions in 1838, up to nineteen millions in 1839, down to ten millions in 1840 The circulation of those under the general law, about a year since, was considerable; but that is probably now diminishing. Mr. Crawford informs us that, in 1816, the entire currency of the country was over one hundred and ten millions; in 1819, as low as forty-five millions—falling off, in three years, the enormous amount of sixty-five millions!

Sir, let us look at the loans and discounts for a few past years. These were low in 1828, 1829, 1830. In 1830, they amounted to $200,000,000. In 1834, they had risen to $324,000,000—augmenting one hundred and twenty-four millions in four years. The next year there were added forty-one millions, and the next ninety-two millions more, and the next, (1837,) sixty-eight millions more; reaching the enormous sum of five hundred and twenty-five millions! Then they began to abate, and went down forty millions the first year, and have continued falling, probably below four hundred and fifty millions now, and would be much less if debtors could pay. In the State of New York the amount has been very changeable. In 1837, the loans and discounts of our chartered banks were seventy-nine millions. In 1838, eighteen millions less. In 1839, seven millions were added. In 1840, down to fifty-two millions; and this last reduction, amounting to sixteen millions, was made in three months. The loans and discounts of the Bank of the United States have been equally variable. In 1832, up to sixty-six millions. In 1834, down to forty-five millions—decrease, twenty-one millions. In 1835, up again to sixty-five millions—increase, in one year, twenty millions. A "regulator," indeed!

Such, sir, is a brief history of the paper currency of the United States. Can any thing be more mutable? But let us look a little at its effects. I will go back no further than 1819, when the United States Bank had been in full operation more than two years, and very briefly notice the effects since that period. Mr. Niles informed us, (vol. 16, page 114,) at that period, "that real estate was rapidly depreciating in its nominal value; that many respectable merchants were bankrupt, and many more must "go;" that the banks refused their accustomed accommodation, and good notes were discounted at three per cent per month." Again, in the same volume, August 7, 1819, he says that fifty thousand persons in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, were wholly or partially idle, for want of employment. In October, of the same year, he mentions a case of property which cost $12,500 being sold by mortgage for $2,500. Of cases in Kentucky. One of a house, for which the owner had been offered $15 000, sold for $1,300. Another, bought for $10,000 $6,000 paid down, and sold on the mortgage for $1,500; leaving the original purchaser $2,500 in debt! In November of that year, he mentions the case of a tailor, in a country village in Pennsylvania, failing for $84,000! Of a tract of three hundred acres of land, with $1,500 of improvements upon it, being sold for $300! Again, in May, 1821, he told us that flour was one dollar per barrel; boards twenty cents per one hundred feet. That one and a half bushels of wheat would buy a pound of coffee, and a barrel of flour a pound of tea. And in September of the same year, he informs us that a miller in Ohio wrote him that he had sold four barrels of flour to obtain the five dollars which he sent to pay for the Register!

In 1824, distress again pervaded the land to an equal degree. Two gentlemen have given us a vivid description thereof—men now honorable Senators, [Messrs CLAY and WEBSTER]—and the picture they draw is painful indeed. They speak of grain, unthrashed, perishing in the barns and barn-yards, for want of a market; of men working merely for means of present subsistence; of a fall in prices, of thirty, if not forty per cent. The same description would apply to 1828, and partially to 1834. And now we are going through another thorough process of depletion.

Sir, this is a hasty, brief, synoptic view of the "times" in this country for some years past. I have endeavored to sketch it rapidly, not being willing to tax the patience of the committee with too much detail, but with perfect fidelity. For a moment let me turn to other countries, as gentlemen before me have done.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to go into a detailed history of the currency of other countries; a few facts will answer my purpose. And first of England, to which we have been so often triumphantly referred during this debate by the opponents of this measure. And this part of her history is full of material for reflection. What strike us at once, in looking at the fiscal concerns of England, are her bank and national debt. And it is a little curious to notice the contemporaneous march of these. In 1689, the national debt of England was only about three millions of dollars. Five years after, (1694,) the Bank of England was chartered with a capital of nearly six millions of dollars, or in other words it loaned one million two hundred thousand pounds to Government, upon which it issued bills, on the notion of a transferable fund, although but little over half the subscription was actually paid in by the stockholders. Against this measure, a strong party was violently opposed, alleging "that it would become a monopoly, engross the whole money of the kingdom, infallibly be subservient to Government views, might be employed to the worst purposes of arbitrary power, weaken commerce by withdrawing money from trade, and employing it in stockjobbing," and lastly, "produce a swarm of brokers and jobbers, to prey upon their fellow-creatures, encourage fraud and gaming, and further corrupt the morals of the nation." They might have added that it would greatly aid Government in rapidly augmenting the national debt, for the facility of borrowing from such a bank, which soon engrossed the whole fiscal operations of the nation, is strongly exemplified by the facts in this case. Government has borrowed largely of this Bank, and afterwards the debt was sanctioned by Parliament, which, no doubt, would not otherwise have been created. This Bank has been renewed several times; the last time in 1833; and I wish to place the growth of its capital in one view, with that of the national debt.

Capital of the Bank of England, and the National Debt at various periods:

Capital.		Debt.
1694,	£1,200,000	1689,	£664,263
1708,	2,175,027	1702,	16,394 702
1727,	9,375,027	1727,	52,092,238
1800,	11,686,000	1793,	239 350 148
1833,	14,686,800	1834,	779,565,783

This Bank of England suspended specie payments in 1797, and remained so until 1821. Its circulation, when it suspended, was about forty-two millions of dollars. In 1817 that circulation amounted to one hundred and forty-five millions. During the next five years it reduced its circulation nearly fifty millions. In 1814 the whole paper circulation of England was, probably, about two hundred and fifty millions of dollars, which was then depreciated twenty-five per cent. making a loss to the public of sixty-two and a half millions; and yet the dividends of the Bank of England, at this period, were ten per cent. The currency of England has been very fluctuating for the last half century. I have already spoken of the circulation of the Bank of England. In 1793, one-third of the country banks became bankrupt. In the pressure of the years 1814, 1815, and 1816, two hundred and forty country banks became bankrupt. In 1825, the Bank of England was all but drained of specie, and was only saved from suspension by issuing some old one pound notes. Mr. McCulloch informs us that "in 1793, 1814, 1815, 1816, and again in 1825, a very large proportion of the country banks were destroyed, and produced by their fall an extent of ruin that has hardly been equalled in any other country." The Bank of England did not fail because, unlike the less favored institutions, it found relief in legalized suspension in the former periods, and in the latter its one pound notes enabled it to bend, till the storm passed. There have been great fluctuations since in that country, and recently this bank has borrowed specie of the Bank of France to prevent a failure; although by its recent charter its notes are made, by statute, a lawful tender every where, except at its own counter. In 1838 alone, there were one thousand bankrupt cases in England.

I ask the indulgence of the committee, while I speak further of England. In 1700, her poor rates were less than five millions of dollars. In 1782, not quite ten millions of dollars. In 1817, they reached the enormous sum of forty-five millions. They are less now, by means of a revision in 1834, by which the poor are less provided for, and more starved, upon principles of national economy—not, if you believe their own legislators, because of less misery and want. Indeed, a report that I have seen, computed that, in 1815, three millions out of eleven millions, in England, were paupers; and recent estimates are, that one in six subsist by more or less parish aid. Sir, I must ask a moment of the committee, while I refer to the debates in Parliament on this subject. Some things found there can hardly be repeated here with decency, as there detailed. But I will give one or two as examples. One member, speaking of the effects of the "water gruel" given to paupers, informs us that it "immediately affected them upward and downward;" and gives us many other, and more disgusting particulars of its effects. Another member, informs us, that a laborer was produced as witness before a committee of the House, whose "tottering condition," on account of "deficient food," would not allow him to stand while testifying, and that this man had a wife and several children! In addition to this, a separation of young married persons is often enforced. In short, whoever examines the system of English charities will find the sufferings of "Oliver Twist" but dim shadowings of the reality.

Nor is the agricultural interest more flourishing, either for the farmer or his hired laborer. Instances are brought forward in the debates, showing that too often the rents, rates, and taxes, exceed the income, after the most severe labor and rigid economy. So great has this distress often appeared, that it has engaged the attention of Parliament with the most intense anxiety. One noble lord, in 1834, said: "if something was not done, the fee simple of the land would soon be in the hands of the paupers." Nor is the hardy laborer in a better condition. One member, in 1838, declares that, as far back as 1795, it was proved that a reduction of not less than fifty per cent. had taken place in the wages of agricultural laborers. Another member says they are in the state of white slaves, and worse off than the negro apprentice of the West Indies; for the latter could look forward to a termination of his bondage. Another tells us that "the English working classes, far beyond those of any nation in the world, are the hardest working and worst requited people;" that "they are the most neglected community in existence." The laborer, it is said, does not get more than half as much solid food per week as the convict. The manufacturing classes present us the same painful picture. Those who read, are too familiar with their bayonet suppressed riots, when starved to madness—with the heart rending accounts of the exhausted and almost sleepless parents—of the blighted child, whose little darkened mind never knew childhood or pleasure; whose bent, and attenuated frame, never felt comfort or ease; whose recollections are only of starvation and weariness; and whose only hopes are to satisfy hunger, and escape the penalties of the "hour system." It has been estimated that eighty-six eighty-sevenths of the population of England (including paupers) are mere operatives, to support the remainder in ease and luxury, while themselves receive but a bare subsistence.

But further. England's debt is about $3,700,000,000. Suppose we divide this debt equally throughout the kingdom—it will amount to about one hundred and fifty-two dollars to each person, paupers and all, or one thousand five hundred and twenty dollars to a family of ten persons. The annual interest and expense of the national debt alone is nearly one hundred and thirty-eight millions of dollars, and, if assessed ratably per poll throughout the kingdom, would be fifty-six dollars to every family of ten persons, without paying one dollar of the principal. Again, the whole expenditures are nearly two hundred and sixty millions of dollars per annum—almost eleven dollars to each person in the kingdom. Take England alone, with her equal proportion of the annual expenditures, and her poor rates, and about fourteen millions for the clergy, and the total is about two hundred millions of dollars per annum, or about fifteen dollars to each person. Probably, deducting women, children, paupers, soldiers, sailors, officers, &c. the burden will fall on about one-tenth of the population—the producers—and the proportion to each of these will be about one hundred and fifty dollars a year. In all, the direct taxes in 1834 were about twenty-four millions; the customs over one hundred millions; the excise money over eighty millions. We have had but four direct taxes, in all amounting to fourteen millions, and no excise since 1802. The national debt of England has been somewhat reduced, very little indeed by payment, but by the creditor taking reduced or different stock. The expenditures of Government, with the interest on the national debt, in time of peace, usually exceed the income. The payment of this national debt must be chimerical and hopeless.

Sir, I have spoken of the condition of the people of England. I will very briefly speak of other countries. First of Ireland. She has her national bank, which has also had a long period of suspension. She has had her small banks, and they have failed repeatedly. In that country, too, banking has been carried to a ruinous extent. But let us look at her laboring classes. I read from an English author; indeed, all that I state respecting European condition, I get from English authors, who are never chargeable with doing injustice to their own countrymen. This I find in Murray's Encyclopedia of Geography: "The pig usually shares his cabin, and is fed like himself on potatoes. It is too great a luxury to be killed for his own consumption, but is sold and driven to the ports, to be salted for exportation." And again, after describing their habitations as hovels of earth, without floors, and their beds as merely straw on the ground, he informs us "his food is potato, without any other vegetable, (for he is a stranger to a garden,) and only in favorable circumstances, is it accompanied with milk." And yet this author informs us, that Ireland exports large quantities of grain and meat; that her exports of these to England alone, in 1832, were over forty-eight millions! Such, sir, is the condition of Ireland—a land with more ardent aspirations for freedom, with more generous hearts and impulses than any other, trodden to the dust, producing food for other nations, while famishing with hunger! No wonder her generous sons flee from a land overshadowed with such political miasma, to this free land.

And such, too, sir, is England. After a thorough trial of the paper system for one hundred and fifty years, the mass of her people are more miserable, the extremes of ruin and distress come oftener, and the amount of misery is greater. True, as gentlemen tell us, she is great among the nations. Her fleets and armies are large, but sad is the spectacle of millions groaning with suffering. She has power, but how was it attained? By plunging the nation into insolvency. No one dreams a tithe of her debt will ever be paid. And what good has her power done the world, while this debt has been accumulating? What benefit to the world have been her wars? Has she blessed her one hundred and twenty-three millions in Asia? Has she been our benefactor? Did she bless France, by forcing a King upon that people? Has she not beeen grinding down her own people, to invade the rights of others? Is that people happy at home? She has had, and has splendid men and splendid things; but the happiness of the many, how is that? We have seen the picture. Sir, she is one great mass of monopoly and prerogative, cemented together by her paper system; and in the midst of all her national glory, all but a small fraction of her people are wretched; and that wretchedness frequently becomes despair, by the almost periodical fluctuations of her monetary system. Strong must be his infatuation, who can cite England as evidence of the advantages of a paper currency. I should cite her as conclusive evidence of its pernicious effects. I do not say, that system is the sole cause of the misery resting on her community, but I do say, that misery is aggravated and perpetuated by monopolies.

How different is France, who has tried this system only in a very limited degree. Her inhabitants almost all own and occupy a little piece of land, and her people are happy. Her national debt, though with the power of her arm she has shaken the political world to its centre, and been shaken in her turn, within the last half century, is but a quarter of that of England. She was aroused to an effort for freedom by the burden of her old national debt. I hope some good may come of the same evil in England. She has, I believe, nearly ten dollars in specie to one in paper, and no bank notes much less than one hundred dollars, while England has about half paper currency, and bank notes but little more than a quarter as large, which in a stress, are often reduced below five dollars. We, sir, notwithstanding our ablest statesmen of all parties deprecate it, have bank notes, sometimes even to fractional parts of a dollar. When the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr OSBORNE] the other day, was speaking of the suppression of small bills as an experiment, I could but think of the strong argument of a distinguished Senator, [Mr. WEBSTER,] in 1832, in favor of this measure.

Holland, too, Mr. Chairman, has been summoned as a witness. Sir, she has had a bank for nearly two centuries. But let it not be forgotten that her commerce was in its zenith before. It was nearly half the commerce of all Europe. But the bank mania has never raged there, and those they have are conducted upon very restricted and safe principles. And what is the result? An English writer tells us: "Holland is, and always has been, a country of short credit. Bankruptcy is rare." That their national character is "solid, steady, quiet, laborious, eagerly intent on the accumulation of wealth, which they seek rather by economy, steadiness, and perseverance, than by speculation." The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] speaks of her taxes. But he forgot to tell us that her population is small, and that she has been over and over again the theatre of contending nations. That, notwithstanding this, her short credit and no speculation system have made her the great creditor of the world. But a short time since, she was about selling out your own capital.

Sir, this is a brief view of the money matters of some parts of Europe, to which honorable gentlemen have so often referred. I am no blind admirer of Europe. Americans should inform themselves for instruction; but we are a new people, trying a new system of national existence, and we should, after all, consult our own good sense, how best to improve the advantages which God and nature have given us.

Sir, shall we best improve these advantages by persevering in our present paper system? What has it led us to already? We have been hurried into a precocious system of expenditure, and although our national debt proper is extinguished, yet the States owe Europe about two hundred millions of dollars, three-fourths of which we have received in merchandise. In 1830 we were square with Europe. Now, some of the States owe there one-eighth of the amount of all the value of their real and personal estate! This immense debt bears an average interest of about five and a quarter per cent. and takes from us annually the sum of ten and a half millions of dollars, as interest alone. Pay back to them the excess of specie we have received within a few years, and then about eight and a quarter millions of annual interest will remain. Already we have begun to pay this tribute, which, with the principal, must be paid in our productions. Last year, our exports of specie exceeded the imports about eight millions! And more—in the midst of all this fancied prosperity, with a territory of about twelve hundred and eighty millions of acres, about six hundred and forty millions of which are probably in the limits of actual occupancy, we have been importing our bread! Yes, Americans, with the fairest portion of God's earth before them, to enter in fee simple and cultivate, have gone across the Atlantic, and run in debt, not only for clothes, but for food!

Sir, I am no enemy to internal improvements. Real ones are an honor and advantage to a people. But the system must always bear its own weight. A generation has no more right to fasten an enormous debt upon posterity, except for the preservation of a nation, than it has to impose servitude; for its payment is servitude. The true policy of nations, like that of individuals, is economy and prudence. But, sir, we have seen our condition as to public debts. Are we better off as individuals? Are we not told by gentlemen of the Opposition, that ruin and distress prevail? Perhaps it is so. I hope it is not so bad as they assure us. Much allowance must be made for their groans just before election. But, sir, I am free to admit that, too regardless of the future, we have run a wild career of speculation and extravagance. Trade, and not work, has been our business. We are plunged into debt, and nothing but the recuperative energies of the people, developed by active industry, can relieve us. Those energies are almost invincible, when properly directed, and untrammeled by privileged restrictions, but with these, seasons of blight, like the present, will come. That one has come, I will not deny. Its cause, I do not doubt. My own State, with all her banks, could not escape. Her business men have felt the power of the law, which is sure to follow one of these expansions. I have attempted to ascertain the amount of judgments recovered in that State, from May 1st, 1837, to November 1st, 1839; that is, from the suspension of the banks to our last election. I was started at the result, and hope my information is incorrect. I shall give this information to my constituents, and should not have adverted to it here, did I not suppose this condition was too common to all the States. Failures throughout this Union have become familiar. Things were different forty years ago, when we had fewer banks. Then a "failure" was a lasting disgrace. Now we have grown wiser, and are less particular.

We are told that this and the preceding Administrations are chargeable with this result. I regret that, on questions of such importance, party politics had not been forgotten. But, sir, it is no doubt owing to our paper system. And who is chargeable with that? Gentlemen have read to us, to prove that General Jackson encouraged the banks to accommodate, after the removal of the deposites. Suppose we admit it, how came he to do so? Who has forgotten the deafening clamor, the plaintive prophecies, in and out of Congress, that the business of the country would be ruined, for want of bank facilities? Who has forgotten the bitter denunciations against that veteran patriot, because he dared an attempt to check, in the least, the headlong career of the wild speculator, by the "specie circular?" Sir, 1836 brought the rage of banking to its grand acme. In the Secretary's tables, (2d sess. 24th Congress,) I find a column of the capital of all the banks "paid in," January 1st, 1836, and a column of those "authorized," December 1st, of the same year—eleven months only. Much of the latter increase, by subsequent events, no doubt, was never used, and the difference (over one hundred and sixty millions, including Territories) is not the precise amount authorized by the several States in that period. But the columns are a fair indication of the spirit of the several Legislatures, relative to the system. I leave out the Territories, but include this District, and charge it to Democratic account. If in the statement I am about giving, I have mistaken the politics of any Legislature, I hope gentlemen will correct me. The account stands thus, in round numbers:

Whig.		Democratic.
Vermont,	$1,000,000	Maine,	$1,600,000
Massachusetts,	10,500,000	Rhode Island,	350,000
Pennsylvania,	41,000,000	New York,	6,000,000
Delaware,	250,000	New Jersey,	3,500,000
Maryland,	21,000,000	District of Columbia,	1,000,000
South Carolina,	2,250,000	Virginia,	200,000
Louisiana,	20,000,000	North Carolina,	1,000,000
Tennessee,	1,000,000	Alabama,	8,000,000
Kentucky,	4,000,000	Mississippi,	12,700,000
Indiana,	600,000	Illinois,	2,400,000
Ohio,	4,500,000
	$106,100,000		$36,750,000

The present embarrassment are plainly attributable to excessive banking, and its never failing consequences, and I leave it to all candid men to decide which of the two great parties in this country, is the bank party.

Sir, we have given a sketch of the paper system, at home and abroad. Facts prove its facilities for plunging a nation into debt; and we have seen that in Europe, at least, communities are happier with less, and more miserable with more of it. Let us for a moment speak of principles. Are banks of service in war? We have never had a National Bank in time of war. The battles were all fought, and the day gained, though peace was not declared before the Bank of North America was chartered. The Bank of England stopped for nearly twenty-five years, through the most critical period of England's contests. No; if a nation is trustworthy, it can always borrow money on its own credit. If it is not, banks will not trust it.

Are they necessary in commerce? A few may, if most carefully indulged, be very convenient. They are, as all experience shows, never indispensable. Barter is the soul of commerce, and the balances are regulated by bills of exchange. It is said that the bills of exchange negotiated in England, during the year 1825, amounted to nearly three thousand millions of dollars Specie would always be sufficient for the more minute balances. Property must sooner or later pay the principal balances. If the Kentuckians send their produce to New York, they must take property, directly or indirectly, in payment, or their trade must soon cease. If they require money alone, and want nothing from New York, or from those who trade with New York, the purchaser in New York, from the very nature of the case, soon has no means to buy. If, on the contrary, as is always the case, they must have the productions of other States, or countries, direct barter, or (temporarily) bills of exchange, is the natural mode of business. And as between nations, one nation never uses the paper currency of another.

So, too, its fickleness disappoints the farmer. He finds beef, or wool, or grain, high this year; but as soon as he has well turned to that branch, a pressure is on the market, and he is in debt for his outlay. These continual expansions and contractions, of which paper currency is so naturally susceptible, and which inevitably happen, encourage the business man to launch out in business and adventure, with an abundance of proffered facilities, owing to expansions, which are soon followed by contractions, which leave him unsupported to his fate. All the world is awake with enterprise to-day; to-morrow, as it were, the stillness of Sabbath prevails. Like the opium eater, we feel strong, rich, and happy, under the stimulus, which is sure to leave us prostrate. This is its pernicious effect upon business alone, without taking into consideration the gambling and immoral spirit it infuses. These things are incident to the system from its very nature. Banks can be increased to any amount, for the borrowers can, and do establish them, (see Mr. Spencer's Report as to the United States Bank stock,) and the amount of notes is illimitable. Not so with specie. Nature has prescribed its amount. This is substantial and useful, and money the world over; the other, is a mere promise, which even rumor may render valueless. God made one, man made the other.

But we are told that we shall ruin credit, and one honorable gentleman brings forward Franklin as its friend. Sir, such credit as Franklin approved, no man would wish to destroy. That credit had its foundation in a character well established for honesty, capability, and industry, which every young man can establish, and without which he is not to be trusted. Sir, the young man in this country, of all others, should be encouraged; for the world is before him, and his energies are not yet pent up by disfranchising customs. But he should not be enticed to bankruptcy and villany. Franklin advised him to no such thing. He taught him that "an empty bag could not stand upright." Thank God, with health, honesty, industry, and prudence, the young man in this country is sure of success. But why lure him on with this charm of credit, to dash his hopes, and tempt his morals, by an almost sure revulsion.

But let us see what this credit costs. Take the ordinary accommodation of a country bank. Its average distance from its customers is considerable. The borrower sends for a thousand dollars for three months. To disburse the whole of it prudently, and to collect it ready at the day, require, say ten days each. Perhaps it will cost him five dollars to send for it. The discount, the interest on the lost time, and the expense of obtaining, are in all about ten and a half per cent. The loans and discounts, in 1837, were five hundred and twenty-five millions; ten and a half per cent. on this, would be over fifty-five millions. This, I admit, is a little too high, as it treats them all as country banks. The interest on this same sum, at seven per cent. would be thirty-six and three-quarter millions—difference is over eighteen millions. But there is another view. I have ascertained from intelligent gentlemen at the head of them, the annual expenses of a city bank, and of a country bank of ordinary capital and business, in my own State. Those of the city bank amount to ten thousand dollars, besides taxes, which are five thousand dollars The country bank to about four thousand dollars, and taxes two thousand eight hundred dollars—average $10,900. There are nine hundred banks; total expenditure, at that rate, would be nine millions eight hundred and ten thousand. The capital of these banks is about three hundred and fifty-eight millions. They usually divide from eight to ten per cent.; and, including their surplus, (according to Mr. Toland's report, the United States Bank, after being in operation sixteen years, had forty-two millions surplus, although Mr. Spencer, now Secretary of State in New York, in the third year of its existence, reported to Congress that it had violated its charter in four particulars,) undoubtedly make at least ten per cent on their capital, probably much more. It must be profitable business, or real estate would not be mortgaged as stock. Ten per cent. is nearly $36,000,000, which, added to the expenditures above, make nearly forty-six millions, which these accommodations cost the borrower, not including loss of time in its use, or the borrower's expense of doing the business. Indeed, from all I can learn, the annual expense of banking is about three per cent. on the capital. But deduct the taxes, as they are not lost to the people, and I find the average expenses, including salaries, rent, postage, &c. is about seven thousand dollars. The amount, then, it costs to work the nine hundred banks, is about six and one-third millions annually, which is a dead loss to the nation, unless counterbalanced by the general benefits of the system.

Is this such credit as a prudent father can recommend to a son? Sir, the system produces nothing. Labor, only, creates wealth. All the promises in the world, either bank or individual, add nothing to the aggregate property in the world. A beneficent God, when he said, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread," a decree which no device of man can evade, knew that by industry alone, man would increase his goods, add to his comforts, and embellish the globe he inhabits. Mother Earth is the only bank which never suspends. She issues post notes, it is true, but she pays interest—ten, twenty, fifty, and sometimes one, or two, or even three hundred per cent. Sir, farming is more profitable to the American "lords of the soil" than banking.

But we are told that the poor laborer will be distressed; and this has been the burden of a speech of an honorable Senator, which has been scattered to every corner, for electioneering purposes. Sir, this cry is the veriest demagogueism. Is the poor laborer of this free country like the serf of Russia, that we are to mete out his living? Are they so abject that they need special legislative care? No, sir; they take care of us, and will look well to us, instead of our taking care of them. They are an intelligent, independent race of freemen, and scorn any thing but equal privileges. They that are poor to-day, may soon be rich. The wide world is open to them; and so long as we have more than a million of square miles of land, not even surveyed, labor, in the country at least, will be high, and we need fear no vile servitude, unless it be by the unwarned, insidious approach of grasping monopoly. But suppose it were otherwise—I have said labor only creates wealth. Who does the labor? The poor laborer. Who, then, is to pay our European debt, the offspring of this banking system, which cannot be paid in promises? The laborer. Why pays the six millions to carry on the banks? The laborer. Who supports the speculator? The laborer. Think you the laborer gains by this extra burden? Whose wages are the last to rise, and the first to fall? What benefit is it to a laborer to raise his wages from seventy-five cents to a dollar a day, and raise flour from five dollars to ten dollars? Has the laborer, with a family to support, got rich within a few years past? What benefit to give him a brisk business, with extravagant prices and increased expenses this year; next, throw him entirely out of employment, or make him work for a bare subsistence? In whose hands were most of the bills of one hundred and sixty banks, which broke between 1811 and 1830? How can a poor man, who wishes to "go West" to buy his "section," safely "lay up" a paper dollar? Sir, in this country, with all its advantages, a steady currency is best for all. Specie alone, from its nature, is so. It is best for the manufacturers; for our high prices induce the foreigner to flood us with his merchandise. Better for the agriculturist, for he can export nothing; it costs too much here; and beside, though he may do well this year, in the language of Mr. Clay his grain perishes unthreshed next. His average gains for a series of years are less. The farm produces no more; and if there is a charm in mere nominal prices, without substantial gain, why not at once call an ounce of silver five dollars? This would be more rational than by a paper inflation. The system, like a certain plant, expands with all the blandishments of hope, only to contract, and crush to death all within its folds.

Sir, I wish to create no prejudice against those who have engaged in banking. They are no doubt good citizens—certainly those with whom I am acquainted—and have only consulted their own interests, like all the rest of the world. It is the system which I doubt. I throw out these hints, and I cannot forbear adding that our present condition is a practical illustration of my remarks. Though in the midst of banks, we are in the midst of debt, foreign and domestic, and in the midst of distress, as we are told every hour. Promises will no longer avail us—no relief but a bankrupt law, or go to work, live economically, and work it out.

But it is said injustice will be done to the honest debtor—he who, perhaps, owes for a farm, purchased on credit at these high prices. Sir, injustice was done to the man who sold a farm upon credit, before the rise. The money he received would not have bought a fifth part of his farm back. The system is full of injustice. But I feel, deeply feel, the force of the appeal. But the remedy, as I shall show in the conclusion of my remarks, belongs alone to the States. Whether they will be inclined to apply the knife at once, or gradually bring the system to its proper level, is not for me to say. In its present unnatural state, all can see it cannot endure, even if all were so agreed. If left to me, I should hesitate before I added to the embarrassment already felt. I do not believe this measure will do so in the least. But, from its own elements, a change or annihilation of this paper system must come. Mr. Crawford, in the ablest production of his life said, in 1820, when we were in a like condition: "It is, then, believed that the evils felt in those sections of the Union, where the distress is most general, will not be extensively relieved by the establishment of a national currency. The sufferings which have been produced by the efforts that have been made to resume and continue specie payments, have been great. They are not terminated, and must continue until the value of property and the price of labor shall assume that relation to the precious metals which our wealth and industry, compared with those of other States, shall enable us to retain. Until this shall be effected, an abortive attempt, by the substitution of a paper currency, to arrest the evils we are suffering, will produce the most distressing consequences. The sufferings which are passed will, in such an event, recur with additional violence; and the nation will again find itself in the situation which it held at the moment when specie payments were resumed." But, sir, we have no power to interfere; and the discussion of this whole subject belongs to the States, and would have been gladly avoided by me, had it not been drawn in as a principal topic by our opponents.

But my colleague [Mr. MARVIN] says the precious metals are insufficient in quantity, and lose by abrasion. The first objection I think unsustained by fact. Withdraw your paper, and specie will increase. In France the currency is about ten-elevenths specie—in England half, while here it has been as low as one-third; and of the actual circulation, no doubt more than nineteen-twentieths were paper. As to attrition or abrasion; he will, I think, find a satisfactory answer in the report of Senator Sanford, in 1830. He there thinks coin should be recoined when four per cent. is abraded, though then it still retains the impression. In ordinary use, to wear away the eagle or dollar, four per cent. he found required two hundred years; the half eagle and half dollar one hundred. Then the piece should be recoined. By this we see the entire amount of the original eagle and dollar would not be abraded short of five thousand years; and that of the half eagle and half dollar two thousand five hundred years, a very different material from that of the other currency. My colleague says Mr. Jacobs suggests that the dark ages might have been owing to the decrease of the specie by abrasion. Sir, if scarcity of specie has this effect, I am not certain but the dark ages will return. If this system is continued, soon none but the antiquary will show us coin. Even our lexicographers are changing the very definition of "money," as every gentleman may see who has the curiosity to examine.

But another colleague [Mr. BARNARD] thinks the use of hard money induces to crime. Sir, I will state a few facts in reply. Mr. McCulloch informs us that in 1820 there were seventy-seven capital convictions for forging Bank of England notes, and two hundred and seventy-five convictions for having them in possession. Total, three hundred and fifty-two; and that seven hundred and seventy-two of such convictions took place in three years. And for ten years previous to 1831, that Bank lost, in forgeries on the funds alone, over one hundred and ninety-four thousand dollars per annum.

Mr. Chairman, but three plans for keeping the national treasure have been suggested. One, by the State banks, is, I believe, repudiated. I have heard no advocate for it here. But not so with a National Bank. But a short time since an honorable member from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] told us this was a "by gone" question. In the debate on this bill, I understood my colleague [Mr. HUNT] to say, "It was not to be spoken of." But, sir, we are now assured that they are sanguine of success in the approaching political contest. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] told us a few days since, that he saw the "Aurora of a brighter day," and that "Dr. Harrison" is about to be called in. And the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POPE] comes forward with a matured plan for a National Bank, which he openly advocates here, and says Mr. Harrison will not veto it. Sir, I do not know whether General Harrison is a doctor or a nurse; but I am quite certain that, if called in, "plasters" will be the prescription. "Aurora" I think an apt figure. She was somewhat inclined to amours. The gentleman's party has formed some strange attachments. She appeared veiled, too. The gentleman will not mistake the application. But these prophecies are periodical. They come as often as the Olympiads, or are rather a leap year inspiration. But experience has shown them false oracles. It is now day, and none but owlish visions deny it. The people are not dissatisfied with this Administration; and if they were, I think when they see the greedy swarm of office seekers, who are the most anxious for a change, they will remember the fable of the Fox and the Flies. Still gentlemen have excited their own delusive hopes, until they are bold enough to speak out. Not only the gentleman from Kentucky, but two other gentlemen from that State, [Messrs. UNDERWOOD and ANDREWS,] and one from Tennessee, [Mr. CROCKETT,] have spoken out without reserve, in favor of a National Bank. Recently the Whig Governor of Connecticut, flushed with victory, forgot his caution; and I may add, I have not heard a Whig member on this floor, during this debate, whose argument has not been, expressly or impliedly, mere or less in its favor, and not one in the least condemnatory. Sir, what would be the first act of that party if in power? Every man can answer. A tendency to a National Bank is Whig polarity, and distress the wind of their hopes. This bank question is like an insidious disease, hanging about the Constitution, ready, at every derangement, to seize and hurry it to death.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RAYNER] told us the people were like certain British troops of Waterloo, begging to engage in the contest. Sir, the similitude is apposite. Certain crowned heads decreed that a gallant people should be governed by the last fragment of a worthless and stagnant blooded race, which that people had unanimously rejected. At Waterloo that decree was executed. So here, a free people have solemly decided that they will not be controlled by a National Bank. Opposition gentlemen may carry out the parallel. Sir, I believe such an institution unnatural, unnecessary, and unauthorized—a fungus upon the Constitution. And when I think of its immense power, over the debtors, it would have in every city and hamlet; of its loans to legislators and editors, and its other "business transactions;" of its enormous electioneering powers, already proved; and of the attachment of a certain class to this institution—I have no hope but in "eternal vigilance."

We are often told here, by our opponents, of the overwhelming power of Andrew Jackson. Suppose he had been a bad man, with an obsequious National Bank of seventy millions at his heels! Sir, strong as he was in the affections of the people, he would probably have been conquered in that memorable struggle, had it not become bank against bank. Whether that conflict was about intentionally or accidentally, it was alike providential. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr POPE] tells us a National Bank will be "a bond of union." Sir, it would be a chain of bondage, which nothing but a revolution would ever break. But, thanks to the "old hero," the tocsin has been heard, the people aroused, and they will never allow themselves again to be either coaxed or tortured into similar danger. They are determined to practise Jeffersonian principles. They feel and know that a strange power, unnamed in, and unknown to, their sacred compact, cannot be safe to their liberties, or compatible with their self-government.

Sir, as to the details of the bill before us, notwithstanding all the objections urged against it, it meets my approbation. I believe it will lessen the patronage of the Administration. No patronage is so dangerous as the control of banking interests. But my colleague [Mr. MARVIN] says the expense of the collection of our revenue has and will increase. Sir, I believe the four last years of the table he held in his hand show the very lowest "rate per cent. on imports." The very next column in that table shows this. Besides, the weights and measures for the States, and some cutters in the Florida service, I am told, are included. Mr. Woodbury, who is never caught napping, has also recommended a reduction of officers in that department.

Nor, sir, do I believe this measure will destroy credit, or destroy the banks, but will, on the contrary, act as a well adjusted balance wheel to the system. And, unlike Opposition gentlemen, I see nothing like a Government bank in it; and am surprised that the advocates of a National Bank should be so alarmed, if there were. But, say gentlemen, the money will not be so safe as in a bank. But they forget that a bank has great liabilities, besides the claim for public deposites. They forget all experience too. Sir, who has forgotten the recent embezzlements by a cashier of an Albany bank? The same of a Philadelphia bank? And more recently still, of a Virginia bank, and many other cases, in some of which, half of a large capital was gone, before the slightest suspicion? By the charter, the bond of the cashier of the United States Bank might be only fifty thousand dollars. Mr. McCulloch informs us that, in 1803, the Bank of England lost, by the fraud of one of its cashiers, (Astlett,) more than one and a half millions of dollars; and that bank lost a still larger sum by the forgeries of Fauntleroy, the banker. Banks are in human keeping, and exposed to the frailties of our nature. This bill contains the severest checks. But, say, they, this will benefit those who live upon salaries. Reduce them if too high. But it will give Government a better currency than the people have. The Constitution knows but one currency, and the people should be content with none other. And who is the Government, but the mere servants of the people? Sir, there is no such thing as the Government's money. The people own it all. And, too, is an answer to the foolish cry of the "purse and sword." Not a dollar can the President touch, without leave of the owners.

Mr. Chairman, I regret that, in the discussion of a question so important, the debate should have contained any thing but argument and reason. I regretted to hear one of my colleagues charge this and the last Administration as "faithless and treacherous," and to hear some harsh language from another. As a New Yorker, I wish some one else had said those things. Sir, it was easy for the President to have yielded to the clamor excited by the banks; to have "eased away," and gone with the current. It would have been easy for the late President to have done so in relation to a National Bank. What, then, but a sense of duty, and the hope of approval by the people and future generations, could have induced them to brave such bitter, hostility. Sir, approving consciences, and a candid world will amply repay them. These tests will send their names down to a grateful posterity, and are most fortunate for them; and such is my admiration of this bill, that I deem my ability to vote for it, most important for me. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] has been more particular. In his remarks yesterday, he spoke with great severity of our present Chief Magistrate. He denies him talent, and adduces as evidence of that, that he did not argue some law case after it reached the court here. I deny the conclusion. So great is the amount and importance of the business of some professional gentlemen of that State, that no other business would justify their absence. But what do my Whig colleagues say to this? The man who successfully competed with our Emmet, Van Vechten, Henry Williams, and all the others of that galaxy of professional talent, as bright as ever adorned a bar, has, after all, but inferior talents! Sir, his bitterest political opponents ever accorded to him the first rank in ability, and every trial, in stations the most trying to the powers of man, has approved their judgment. But he brings another charge—that he did not bear arms during the last war. Sir, his services at that critical period were most important to the country. The journals of my own State show what they were. He was the right arm of the patriotic Tompkins, and by his ability the support of that great State was effectually given to the war. The "classification" bill, and many other matters, are lasting monuments of his zeal and patriotism in those trying times. No New Yorker ever presumes to doubt this. But he supported Clinton and not Madison. Sir, I have in my hand the address of the New York Committee, acting for the State Committee, at that period, to which I find high Democratic names, and in which they say, they were not enemies to Mr. Madison, but preferred Mr. Clinton, because they believed he would prosecute the war with more vigor. He was of their own State, and they supported him, not that they loved Madison less, but Clinton more. But once more: I understood the honorable gentleman to say that Clinton, in his dying moments, execrated Mr. Van Buren for treachery. Does any man in New York believe this? Do not circumstances preclude it. Were not these illustrious men friends at that time, and have not the grateful sons of the one, since felt the effects of that friendship. Sir, the gentleman says Patrick Henry, had he known certain things, would have desired to have been buried with his face downward. Clinton, too, I believe, would rather have been so buried than to have his grave made a speaking trumpet to slander his friend. Sir, to the gentleman from Pennsylvania I accord superior talents; and none, unwarped by prejudice, can deny the same, in a most eminent degree, to the object of his attack. So far, then, they are kindred and lofty spirits; and I regret that, in the honorable gentleman's valedictory, he should have shot a Parthian arrow, tipped with the poison of personal vituperation.

Mr. Chairman, a word upon the "divorce," so called, and I have done. Gentlemen implore Government to give the people a good currency. Sir, in a Republican Government the confederated power should be simple, well authorized, and well defined. In the exercise of its functions there should be no assumption of doubtful authority. A rule of clear right only can preserve harmony in the whole. If restrained by strict construction, none can complain. What right, then, has Congress to give a currency to the States? By what clause in the Constitution? Does not that fix the currency, as far as we can interfere? How humiliating to these States would be such a step, if submitted to! It would be a great stride to consolidated power. No. There is the instrument. By it all must act. Nor, sir, would it be wise to do so, if we had the power. Dangerous to the purity of our elections would it be to mingle with them questions on the currency. These latter appeal to the cupidity of man, and excite his worst passions. It would be a bribery upon the elective franchise. The very principle degrades the free elector. If the price current is to elect our President, let us nominate a Jew, and fill that high office with some deep scheming broker at once.

Sir, this bill proposes to disconnect Government from all these dangers; to place us above their reach, and leave nought upon all but their plainest constitutional duty. For this alone it is worthy the support of every freeman, who feels how dangerous it is to add the ebbs and flows of monetary influence of the deep surges of the political tempest.

SPEECH OF MR. SLADE, OF VERMONT,

In the House of Representatives, on the 18th and 20th January, 1840—On the right of petition, the power of Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, the implied faith of the North and the South to each other in forming the Constitution, and the principles, purposes, and prospects of Abolition.

The question pending being upon a proposition to adopt the following as one of the standing rules of the House, viz: "That, upon the presentation of any memorial or petition praying for the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any District, Territory, or State of the Union, and upon the presentation of any resolution or other paper touching that subject, the reception of such memorial, petition, resolution, or paper shall be considered as objected to, and the question of its reception shall be laid on the table, without debate or further action thereon"—

Mr. SLADE said he had not intended, until very recently, to address the House on the general question of slavery, pending the present discussion. It had been his purpose to confine himself, in the remarks he had thought to make upon the proposition before the House, to a consideration of its absurdity as a rule, and its effect in abridging the right of petition. But the course which the debate had taken, and the great freedom with which gentlemen from the South had assailed those of the North who had petitioned for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, had induced him to change his determination. He no longer felt himself at liberty to refrain from going into the great question, though he felt quite unprepared to do it at the present time. The discussion of that question had been brought on by Southern gentlemen; and he could not hesitate to meet them upon it promptly.

But, in doing this, Mr. S. said he should feel himself restrained, as well by his respect for the House, as by considerations of a higher character, from indulging in the recriminations which some remarks he had heard had tended to provoke. It was his purpose to address himself to the subject; and he intended, if he could not do it justice, at least to discuss it in a manner becoming its grave importance and high character; and if, in the ardor of debate, he should say any thing personally offensive to any, he begged to give assurance that it would be altogether unintentional.

ABSURDITY OF THE PROPOSED RULE.

The proposition (said Mr. S.) before the House is to amend its rules, by providing that all petitions or other papers touching the abolition of slavery or the slave trade in any District, State, or Territory of the United States shall, upon presentation, be considered as being objected to, and the question of their reception thereupon be laid upon the table without debate.

My first objection to this rule (said Mr. S.) is, that it involves an absurdity. It is sought to make this one of the standing rules of the House. Now, sir, what is a rule? It is defined to be "that which is settled by authority or custom, for guidance and direction." This is in accordance with the caption of our rules, which is as follows: "Standing rules and orders for conducting business in the House of Representatives of the United States." They are to regulate the conducting of business. But is the proposition before us of the nature of a guide or regulator for the conducting of business? The essential element of business is action. But does this proposition contemplate any future action of the House? No. It anticipates and entirely supersedes that action. It, in the first place, declares that, upon the presentation of petitions and papers of a certain character, their reception shall be considered as being objected to. No actual objection is contemplated; but it is declared, beforehand, that an objection shall be considered as being made. Is this a rule of action? It supersedes action.

Again: The proposed rule declares that the question of reception, thus raised by a parliamentary fiction, shall be laid upon the table. Now, when the case shall arise, and the question of reception shall be laid upon the table, what will lay it on the table? It will be this rule—not the action of the House at the time. That will have been anticipated and superseded. And yet this is to be called a standing rule for the conducting of the business of the House! Can any thing be more absurd?

But, to make this absurdity still more apparent, let us look at the contemplated rule in connection with the twenty-first of the present rules. That rule declares that "the petitions having been presented and disposed of, reports from committees shall be called for and disposed of. Resolutions shall then be called for in the same order, and disposed of by the same rules which apply to petitions." The disposition of petitions, resolutions, and reports here provided for, evidently contemplates the action of the House when they are presented. Such disposition constitutes a part of the actual business of the House. It is, to do something with them. And yet, if the proposition before us becomes a rule, that something will have been done, in effect, months, perhaps, before—leaving absolutely nothing to be done when the papers are presented.

But, further: The Constitution declares that "each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings." Now, let us see how the Clerk will journalize the proceedings under this rule. Suppose it to be adopted on the 1st of February. On the 1st of July next petitions are presented which come within it. What will be the entry on our journal? To make it correspond with the real nature of this proceeding, it should be as follows:

On the first of July, 1840, Mr. ADAMS presented the petition of five hundred men and five hundred women of Plymouth county, Massachusetts, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, which was considered as being objected to; and the question of its reception was laid upon the table by a vote of the House on the first of February, 1840.

Such would be the absurdity of the journal, if it were to tell the truth; because the truth would be, that there would no actual proceeding on the petition on the day of its presentation. The action of the House would have been on the first of February, and not on the first of July; and the journal could not be a journal of its proceedings on the latter day. The reception of the petition would not be objected to on the first of July, but on the first of February; while the action of the House which would lay the question of reception on the table would have been on the first of February, and not on the first of July.

There would seem to be but one way of avoiding this absurdity, and that would be by giving such a construction to the rule as to compel some member to object on the first of July to the reception of the petition, and to compel a majority of the members to vote on that day to lay the question of reception on the table! I need not say in what a ridiculous and degrading position this would place the House. It would, however, not be more ridiculous or degrading than for the House to sit here on that day, and witness the silent disposition of petitions under this rule, as has been witnessed under the operation of former gags. Either of the results alluded to would be in perfect keeping with the folly and absurdity of the whole gag system, from the Pinckney gag of 1836 to the new-fangled gag we are now considering.

But again. What becomes of the right of the members of this House to vote on the first of July next on the question of the reception of the petition, in the case I have supposed? Who can constitutionally deprive me of that right, and of the exercise of it by my yea or nay, provided I can obtain for that purpose the request of one-fifth of the members present on that day?

This denial of the right of voting would wear a more striking appearance of usurpation—though it would not be more so in principle—in its application to new members, who might come into Congress, after the adoption of this rule, to fill vacancies; or in its application to those who, like the New Jersey members, may not have been able to obtain their seats until after the adoption of the rule.

Suppose that such a member, on taking his seat, presents a petition, and moves that it be referred to a committee—what will be his astonishment on being told by the Chair that the petition cannot be referred, and that even no motion to refer it can be entertained? But, says the astonished member, Mr. Speaker, this is a petition from my constituents, which I wish to have this House receive and consider; and I move that it be received and referred. The Chair, you respond, informs the gentleman that this petition is considered as being objected to, and that the question of its reception is laid upon the table. Considered as being objected to? replies the member. Considered? What does this mean? It was considered as being objected to on the first of February last, replies the Chair. But, says the member—his astonishment increasing—this petition was not in existence on the first of February. That, you reply, makes no difference; the House considered that it might come into existence, and be presented here; and considered it proper that, when it should, it should be considered as being objected to, and it is therefore now considered as being objected to, and the question of its reception is laid upon the table. Laid upon the table! exclaims the member. How is it laid upon the table? Nobody has moved to lay it on the table, and there has been no vote to that effect. How, then, is it laid upon the table? By a vote of the House on the first of February last, replies the Speaker. The first of February last! says the member. This petition was not then in being, and I, the Representative of the petitioners, was not here to vote. Before the question of the reception of this petition shall be decided; I claim the right to vote upon it, and to record that vote on your journal. The gentleman, you reply, cannot be allowed this privilege. The question of reception is considered as made, and that question is laid upon the table; and the gentleman will take his seat!

Thus ends the farce—a farce which I have seen acted over here a hundred times, in varied forms, during the last four years, though under the operation of gags which, for refinement of absurdity, can pretend to no equality with this.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another view in which the infringement of right by the rule in question appears yet more flagrant. It really amounts to an enactment by this House that no petition for the abolition of slavery or the slave trade shall be received. It seems, I know, to be otherwise. But it seems one thing while it is another; for, after the enactment of the farce which the rule contemplates, the petition is still left in the hands which presented it. This is the inevitable result, from the nature of the proceeding. The order is, not that the petition shall be laid upon the table, but that the question of its reception shall be thus disposed of. But does the laying of the question of reception on the table amount to the reception itself? It seems to me that this involves a manifest contradiction; for, if such is the effect of laying that question on the table, then it puts the House in possession of the petition, and thus accomplishes the very thing which the motion to lay the question of reception on the table was intended to prevent.

The result to which this process of reasoning brings us is in accordance with the fact; for, in point of fact, the petition does not pass out of the hands of the member presenting it until the quietus is given to the question whether it shall pass out of his hands and be received, by the vote to lay that question on the table. All that has ever passed from the member to the clerk is the mere annunciation of the petition. Nothing is, in fact, received, but annunciation. The petition, therefore, in point of fact, as well as in contemplation of parliamentary law, remains in the hands of the member presenting it.

So, then, whatever may be the strictly parliamentary result of the magic operation of this rule, the substance of it, all can see, is, that the petition has, to all substantial purposes, been rejected, and the petitioner treated with contempt.

ABRIDGEMENT OF THE RIGHT OF PETITION.

The petitions being thus left in the hands of the members presenting them, we are brought to the main objection—namely, that the effect of the rule would be to abridge the right of petition. The Constitution (Art. 1 of the amendments) declares that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

"Petition." What is it? To ask for something desired; and to ask of some being—individual or aggregate—who has ears to hear. It is essential, then, to the enjoyment of the right of petition, that the petitioner should have access to the ear of power. It would be a mockery for power to say the right is perfect, and yet shut itself up beyond the reach of the vision or the voice of supplication. "The eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his ears are open to their cry." What would the privilege of prayer be worth, if the ears of Divine mercy were not "open?" "Oh thou that hearest prayer," was the exclamation of David. It has hence become a part of the description of the Almighty that He is "the hearer of prayer."

Suppose we draw a line around this Capitol, and say to the people, hitherto may you come with your petitions, but no further; and then tell them that they still have the right of petition, because they have the use of pen, ink, and paper, and may draw up their petitions. Would not this be an insulting mockery? If they may not come within that line, or what is essentially the same thing, if they may not get their petitions to our ears, might they not just as well send them to the British Parliament as to send them here?

In defining the right of petition, I have anticipated, to some extent, the question, whether it would be abridged by the adoption and enforcement of the proposed rule. That rule, as I have shown, in effect refuses the reception of the petition, and leaves it in the hands of the petitioner. Or, if I am not correct in this view of the effect of the rule, and, under it, the petition must go to the table, it is substantially the same thing, because in that case, to all practical purposes, the hearing and considering of the prayer is refused. Whatever speculations there may be as to the critical construction of the rule, every petitioner will see and feel that his petition is rejected. The language the proceeding is, We will not hear you! If this does not abridge the right of petition, I should be glad to learn what would abridge it.

Mr. Speaker, if we make the order now contemplated, how long think you will it be before we shall be called on to make an order that no petition touching the subject of slavery shall be presented here? Nothing would be more natural than such a transition; for, in the first place, the adoption of the rule now proposed will evince that there is no want of a disposition to go further, if necessary; and, in the next place, it will increase the disposition of the people to petition; and they will petition until, to get rid of the annoyance, and to avoid the moral influence of the annunciation of their petitions here, their very presentation will be suppressed. And next will come a law making it penal to present such petitions. Let no one start at this suggestion, for such a law would not be a plainer violation of the Constitution than was the bill which came near passing the Senate, prohibiting the transportation of abolition papers by the mail.

The rule before us may seem to some a very small affair; but smaller encroachments on popular rights than this have grown to a fearful magnitude. The history of all usurpations shows that the disposition for encroachment uniformly increases with its acquisitions of power. The voraciousness of appetite is augmented by the aliment on which it feeds.

Sir, it is like the letting out of waters. There was a striking example of this in my own State. A few boys thought to have a little amusement by cutting a trench in the bank of a large pond, that they might see the discharge of the water into an adjoining ravine. The trench was cut, and the water began to run. But their amusement was soon changed into terror; for the running water gradually found its way to the quicksand, when the channel suddenly deepened—the earth trembled—and the boys escaped for their lives; while the rushing waters swept away the bank, and the whole pond soon moved onward, carrying before it trees, fences, mills, and dwellings in wild and wanton desolation, until it reached a neighboring lake.

Such was the emptying of Glover pond. It is but a faint emblem of what we may expect if we let out the waters through the channel we are now cutting. Sir, our motto should be, obsta principiis—stand upon your principles. In such a case, let there not be the slightest abandonment of them. Let no suggestions of temporary expediency be listened to for a moment. Let it be remembered that the course which may be now adopted, as an expedient to suppress the utterance of hostility to slavery, may hereafter be drawn into a precedent to justify attempts to suppress the popular voice on other subjects, and that thus, gathering strength, encroachment may go on from conquering to conquer, until it shall sweep away the whole barrier which the Constitution has interposed as a security to the right of petition; and with it, at last, all the guarantees of popular rights.

Mr. Speaker, the principles we are about to adopt has immense bearings. Let its tendency be well considered. There is no matter of public concernment to which it may not be made to apply—no great interest in the country which it may not reach.

Suppose the South should, at some future time, find it necessary to petition for a reduction of a high tariff; what would hinder the application of the principle of the contemplated rule (which might have gained great strength by use) to that case? And how would Southern gentlemen feel, to be met here by the application and enforcement of such a rule as this? How would they like a sweeping order, under which the petitions of their constituents should be considered as objected to, and considered as laid udon the table? What demonstrations of indignation and wrath might not be expected; and especially from the representatives or that State (Virginia) in which originated the amendment of the Constitution expressly inhibiting an abridgment of the right of petition? How bitter would be the cup—returned to their own lips—which they are now endeavoring to force to the lips of others.

I have spoken of petitions from the South. But the application may be made to petitions from other quarters—to petitions, for example, from the North and East for an increase of duties for the protection of their industry. By and by, petitions may come pouring in here for an investigation into the corruptions and abuses of the Executive Government—(and I tell you, sir, they will come, unless abuses and corruptions are speedily checked)—and then it will be very convenient for power to take shelter behind such a sweeping rule as this. The fear of excitement is now a prominent reason for suppressing petitions; then it will be a fear of exposure!

But, while I am contending for the right of petition, and maintaining that the reception of petitions ought not to be refused, I do not claim that this shall be regarded as a rule without any exception. I admit that this House, as well as every other legislative body, may entertain the question of reception, not, however, in the form now contemplated, by a sweeping rule, but upon motion, as petitions may be presented. This, the English rules of parliamentary practice, which we have adopted, clearly recognise, it being required by them that, "regularly, a motion for receiving it (the petition) must be made and seconded, and a question put whether it shall be received."

The same right to entertain the question of reception is also recognised in the standing rules both of the Senate and of this House, each of them providing that "a brief statement of the contents" of petitions "shall verbally be made by the introducer;" and the former adding, expressly, that this shall be done "before any petition or memorial shall be received and read at the table."

The right of petitions, thus recognised in the English and American parliamentary law, is founded in the obvious necessity that every legislative body should have the power of self-protection from abuse and insult, assailing it under the sacred garb of petitions for redress of grievance.

There should also be a power of rejecting promptly all petitions for absurd, ridiculous, or impracticable objects, presented in a spirit of mere wantonness; examples of which will readily occur to every one.

There is, perhaps, another ground on which the reception of petitions may be refused; and that is, the unconstitutionality of the action which they ask Congress to take. This power is liable, however, to great abuse, and should be exercised, as should the power of rejection in other cases, with extreme caution. The unconstitutionality of the action prayed for should be flagrant and undeniable; since, in questions between freedom and power, construction should always lean in favor of the former. Such clear and undoubted cases, would be, for example, petitions that Congress would establish a religion by law, or abolish the trial by jury, or grant titles of nobility, or permanently suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, or pass a bill of attainder, or an ex post facto law. Prayers for such objects would clearly not be for a "redress of grievances." The grievance would rather be that Congress should be compelled to receive and consider such petitions.

In making the admission that the reception of petitions may be refused on the ground of the clear and undoubted unconstitutionality of the action prayed for, I have done it, knowing, of course, that it is on this ground that the reception of petitions praying for the abolition of slavery is objected to. I am willing to meet the question of reception with this incumbrance, if it be an incumbrance; for I intend, before I shall have done, to urge reasons and present authority in support of the right of Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade here, which shall put gentlemen upon showing, not merely that the constitutional-ty of such legislation is doubtful, but that it is not most clear and undeniable.

I have admitted the exceptions to the general rule, that petition should be received and considered, not only from a regard to the principles which seem to demand them, but from a regard to the right of petition itself. My very desire to maintain the sacredness of the right leads me to desire that it may not be encumbered with a claim to unlimited license.

Thus limited and guarded from abuse, the right of petition is, next to the right of suffrage, the most important and efficient of the political rights secured to the people. It carries with it a tremendous power; for, though it wears the modest garb of a right to request, it really possesses, by its moral influence, and by the consciousness of responsibility which awakens in the representative body, the power almost of command. The right of suffrage can be exercised but periodically—that of petition continually. It is a standing constitutional medium of communication from the people to their representatives. Its sacredness should be guarded, therefore, with the most wakeful jealousy; and it is thus guarded. There is no right concerning which the people are more jealous than this. Wo, wo, to the representative who, under any pretence, however specious, treats it with contempt. To associate any cause, no matter what, with a practical denial of this right, will be sure to bring it into discredit, if not to overwhelm it with ruin.

Thus far, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken of the proposed rule in reference to its application to petitions. But there is a class of papers to which it will apply, of a very different character. I mean resolutions of State Legislatures touching the subject of slavery. Such resolutions I now hold in my hand, adopted by the Legislature of my own State at its last session, and which it is my purpose to present to this House as soon as it shall be in order to do so. Under the operation of the proposed rule, the reception of those resolutions will be "considered" as objected to, and the question of their reception will be considered as laid upon the table!

Now, sir, I put it to the State Rights members of this House, as well as to all others, whether they are ready to adopt a rule which shall thus act on resolutions of the sovereign States of this Union. The States do not present themselves here in the attitude of petitioners. They are sovereign States. They ask nothing. They exercise the right of resolving, and of making known to us their resolutions. Such is their true character and position. We are not at liberty to assume the possibility of their passing any resolutions which this House can rightfully refuse to receive, either on account of their manner or their matter. And, sir, in accordance with this view of their character and their relation to this body, I shall, when I present the resolutions to which I have referred, announce that I present resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Vermont, which, in the name of that State, I demand to have read and considered.

And now, sir, I again ask, Will State Rights gentlemen vote for a rule which shall cast down the sovereign States of this Union from the high and independent position they thus rightfully occupy, when their resolves are presented for consideration here? Sir, they cannot, they will not, do it.

POWER OF CONGRESS TO ABOLISH SLAVARY AND THE SLAVE-TRADE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to a grave and important question, namely, that of the constitutional power of Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia. The right to adopt the rule before us, and thereby reject all petitions and other papers touching that subject, is claimed on the ground that no such power exists. I have asserted that it does exist, and I will now proceed to prove it.

All power over this subject is derived from the grant of power in the Constitution, which declares (Sec. 8, Art. 1,) that "Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States."

What is the extent of the power of legislation here granted?

In the first place, it is "exclusive." There is no other concurrent jurisdiction. To the full extent of its power of legislation, whatever it may be, Congress excludes all other legislation, so as that the States to whose jurisdiction the territory forming the District originally belonged, have no more power to extend their legislation to it, than the States of Georgia or Maine.

In the next place, it extends to "all cases whatsoever." No effort to find language granting all possible power of legislation could have selected terms more comprehensive than these. "All cases whatsoever"—embracing, of course, a range of objects as wide, and a power of acting on them as ample and extended as fall within the competency of any Legislature.

And this extent of the power of its legislation is in perfect accordance with the exclusiveness of the jurisdiction of Congress over the territory. All other legislative authority being excluded, there arises an obvious necessity that that of Congress should be complete; otherwise the people of the District would be left without a Legislature, competent to the necessary and indispensable purposes of government.

But further. Look at the sweeping language of the grant of power to legislate for this District, in contrast with the specific grants of power to legislate for the country generally. In regard to the latter, this Government is one of specifically granted powers. Thus, for example, in the first sixteen clauses of the 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution, Congress is authorized, among other things, to regulate commerce, to coin money, to establish post offices and post roads, to declare war, to raise and support armies, and to provide and maintain a navy, etc. All the powers (including, of course, the power to pass laws necessary and proper for carrying these powers into execution) not thus specifically granted, were reserved to the States, or to the people.

Now, why was the language changed in the 17th clause of the 8th article, from the specification, as in the previous sixteen clauses, of particular cases in which Congress might legislate, to the general grant of power to legislate "in all cases whatsoever?" Why did not the 17th clause also specify the particular cases in which Congress might legislate for the District? No other answer can be given to this question than that it was intended to grant all legislative power—to make no exception—to leave nothing for the control, either of the people of the District, or of any other power; so that the great design of setting apart a separate district for the seat of the Government of the United States might be fully answered—namely, that of having it subjected to the jurisdiction and control of no other power.

But again. If the power of Congress to legislate for the District is limited, who is to determine what the limitation shall be? Why exclude the subject of slavery rather than any other subject? If "all cases whatsoever" mean only some cases, who is to determine what those some cases are? One may exclude slavery—another the matter of the currency—another the prohibition of lotteries—another the suppression of duelling—another of gambling, and another the power to punish crimes. What is right? Who shall determine? Who can determine.

Mr. Speaker, ir we leave the plain, intelligible terms of the grant of power in this case, and resort to implication, we leave a solid rock for the trembling quicksand, which will sink beneath us.

But do any still doubt with regard to the completeness of the power of Congress over this District? If my reasoning has failed to convince them, let me call your attention to the exposition given to this clause of the Constitution by distinguished men at the time of its adoption.

Mr. MADISON has been justly styled the father of the Constitution. In the forty-third number of the Federalist, speaking of the clause in question, he said:

"The indispensable necessity of complete authority at the seat of Government carries its own evidence with it. It is a power exercised by every Legislature of the Union—I might say, of the world—by virtue of its general supremacy."

"Complete" was the simple, significant, comprehensive term used by Mr. Madison to express his idea of the power.

Let me next turn to the debates in the Virginia Convention, during its deliberations upon the adoption of the Constitution. Virginia authority, I think, must be good here on this subject. On looking into these debates, I find that the clause of the Constitution now in question was objected to by several leading members of the convention, expressly on the ground of the unlimited extent of the power which it conferred on Congress. Mr. GRAYSON said that, "after mature deliberation, he could not find that the ten miles square was to be looked upon even as part of a State; but to be totally independent of all, and subject to the exclusive legislation of Congress." Mr. MASON said "this clause gives an unlimited authority, in every possible case, within the District." PATRICK HENRY called it "unlimited, unbounded authority."

Mr. MADISON, who participated in the debate, admitted the correctness of the construction to which I have referred, by replying to the argument against the adoption of the Constitution, thus drawn from the "unlimited, unbounded authority" which it conferred—that "there must be a particular cession by particular States of the District to Congress; and the States may settle the terms of the cession," and "may make what stipulation they please in it."

I have thus shown—from the express language of the Constitution—from the necessary exclusiveness of the jurisdiction of Congress—from the language of the grant of power in this case, in contrast with the other grants of power—from the absence of every thing from the Constitution which can enable us to determine what exercise of legislative power, if any, shall be excepted from the grant in question—and from contemporaneous construction—that Congress possess the constitutional power to abolish slavery and the slave-trade in the District of Columbia.

And now, Mr. Speaker, let me show you what construction has since been put upon this grant by Congress, by committees of Congress, by members of Congress from slaveholding States, by the people of this District, and by men now occupying the highest stations in this Government.

On the 1st of March, 1816, the House of Representatives, on motion of Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the existence of an inhuman and illegal traffic in slaves, carried on in and through the District of Columbia, and to report whether any, and what, measures are necessary for putting a stop to the same."

This resolution, it will be observed, did not contemplate the mere regulating of the slave-trade, but the annihilation of it. Nobody can pretend that the action of Congress which the resolution contemplated did not involve the whole question of slavery here—the power to abolish the slave-trade manifestly including the power to abolish slavery.

The committee appointed under this resolution were Messrs. Randolph and Kerr, of Virginia, Maryatt, of South Carolina, Goldsborough, of Maryland, and Hopkinson, of Pennsylvania. This committee, four of whom were from slaveholding States, manifested their concurrence with the House in its acknowledgment of the power of Congress over the subject of slavery by asking for authority to send for persons and papers, which the House granted.

The committee, on the 30th of April, reported sundry depositions taken by them, which were ordered to lie on the table. And here terminated the whole proceeding! Although Mr. Randolph, on offering the resolution, urged the necessity of immediate action, and declared that "if the business was declined by the House, he would undertake it himself, and ferret out of their holes and corners the villains who carried it on," yet, "the business" was never prosecuted beyond the taking and reporting of the depositions, which depositions, by the way, are not now to be found on the files of this House!

The zeal of Mr. Randolph and of the committee appears to have suddenly evaporated! They discovered that they were attacking the "Patriarchal institutions," and shaking what has since been called "the corner-stone of our republican edifice"—and desisted! But they showed, and the House showed, that they considered the power of Congress over the subject of slavery here to be as complete as over any other subject.

On the 11th of January, 1827, the Committee for the District of Columbia, by their chairman, Mr. Powell, of Virginia, said, in a report to the House: "The Congress of the United States has, by the Constitution, exclusive jurisdiction over this District; and has the power upon this subject, (the imprisonment of free negroes as runaways, and their sale into slavery,) as upon all other subjects of legislation, to exercise unlimited discretion." "Unlimited" was the very word used by Patrick Henry in the Virginia Convention, to express his idea of the extent of the power.

I come now to a still more distinct recognition of the power for which I contend.

On the 9th of January, 1829, the House of Representatives, on motion of Mr. Miner, of Pennsylvania, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the gradual abolition of slavery within the District, in such manner that the interest of no individual shall be injured thereby."

This resolution was passed by a vote of 114 to 66; and it is worthy of remark that, of those who voted in the affirmative, eleven were from the slave States, viz: one from Delaware, two from Maryland, three from Virginia, one from North Carolina, one from Tennessee, and three from Kentucky.

On the 29th of January the Committee for the District of Columbia reported a bill, providing, among other things, that no slave should be imported into the District; and that, upon such importation, the slave should be free, on leaving the District within ten days. Of the committee of seven who thus recognised the power of Congress over the subject of slavery here, there were four from slave States, viz: two from Virginia and two from Maryland.

It further appears that on the 20th of April, 1830, a similar bill was reported by Mr. Washington, of Maryland, chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia.

In April, 1836, Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina, chairman of a committee on Abolition, read the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That Congress possess no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this Confederacy.

"Resolved, That Congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia."

Here, again, the power to legislate on the subject of slavery here is clearly admitted, by the marked difference in the phraseology of the two resolutions; the first expressly declaring that Congress have no constitutional power to interfere with slavery in the States, while the second merely declares that Congress ought not to interfere in this District, omitting all reference to the Constitution.

In accordance with these proceedings, which show the recognition by the House of Representatives and its committees of the power in question, is the presentation by members of Congress from the slave States of Abolition memorials, viz:

By Mr. Rhea, of Tennessee, January 14, 1822, from citizens of that State, for the gradual abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

By Mr. Saunders, of North Carolina, December 13, 1824, from citizens of that State, praying for the gradual abolition of slavery in the United States.

By Mr. Barney, of Maryland, on the 11th of February, 1828, from citizens of Baltimore, for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia.

By Mr. A. H. Shepperd, of North Carolina, March 30, 1828, from citizens of that State, praying Congress to take measures for the entire abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and

By Mr. Washington, of Maryland, March 5 1830, from inhabitants of the county of Frederick, in that State, for the same object.

To these expressions of opinion by individual members of Congress from slave States, I add that of Alexander Smyth, of Virginia, in the debate on the Missouri question, in January, 1820, in which he said:

"If the future freedom of the black is your real object, and not a mere pretence, why do you not begin here? Within the ten miles square you have undoubted power to exercise exclusive legislation. Produce a bill to emancipate the slaves in the District of Columbia, or, if you prefer it, to emancipate those born hereafter."

From these recognitions of the power in question, I turn to admissions of the power by the people of this District.

In the year 1802, the Grand Jury of the county of Alexandria made a formal presentment of the slave trade as a "grievance." Having described the trade, with its horrible and heartrending atrocities, they say: "We consider these grievances demanding legislative redress."

Let me stop a moment to consider the language of this presentment—"grievances!" We have been told that slavery and the slave trade here are no grievance, whose redress can be prayed for, because Congress have no power over the subject. Not so thought the Grand Jury of Alexandria. And then, again, we are told that slavery and the slave trade are no grievance to the people of the North, because their interests are not affected by them. How were the interests of the grand jurors of Alexandria affected by what they presented as a grievance? It did not take away their property—it did not destroy their health, or endanger their lives, but it outraged their feelings; and therefore it was a "grievance." It outrages the feelings of my constituents; and therefore it is a grievance to them. It is an outrage committed under the authority of the laws of Congress, for which they share a responsibility; and therefore they ask for their repeal.

But I have in my hand a still stronger expression on the subject from this District. It is a memorial earnestly praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade here, signed by more than eleven hundred citizens of the District, presented to Congress in 1828; among the signers of which were Chief Justice Cranch, Judge Morsell, and Gen. Van Ness, besides a large number of others of the most intelligent and respectable of the inhabitants of the District. And now, sir, listen to the expression of their opinion upon the power of Congress.

After describing in glowing language the horrors of the slave trade here, comparing it with the foreign slave trade, denounced and punished as piracy, and speaking of "the reproach of inconsistency cast upon the free institutions established among us," they say:

"We behold these scenes continually taking place among us, and lament our inability to prevent them. The people of this District have, within themselves, no means of legislative redress; and we therefore appeal to your honorable body as the only one invested by the American Constitution with the power to relieve us."

Two years after the presentation of this memorial, viz: in January, 1830, the Grand Jury of the county of Washington expressed their conviction of the power of Congress over this subject, in a communication addressed to the chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, in which they gave an appalling description of the slave trade, and declared that "the inhuman practice is so shocking to the moral sense of the community, as to call loudly for the interposition of Congress."

Let me present you, Mr. Speaker, with the additional testimony of two distinguished men, and I shall have done with the question of constitutional power. I refer to the declarations of the two highest officers of this Government.

In the United States Senate on the 1st of February, 1820, in the debate on the Missouri question, RICHARD M. JOHNSON of Kentucky said:

"In the District of Columbia, containing a population of 30,000 souls, and probably as many slaves as the whole Territory of Missouri, the power of providing for their emancipation rests with Congress alone. Why, then, this heartrending sympathy for the slaves of Missouri, and this cold insensibility, this eternal apathy towards the slaves in the District of Columbia?"

And now I give you the testimony of the present Chief Magistrate of the United States, whom no one will suspect of a want of inclination to please the South, by denying the constitutional power of Congress over this subject, if it were possible to find even plausible reasons for such a denial. In a letter to a committee of gentlemen in North Carolina, of the 6th of March, 1836, Mr. VAN BUREN said:

"I would not, from the lights now before me, feel myself safe in pronouncing that Congress does not possess the power of abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia!"

This was Mr. Van Buren's way of affirming the power of Congress to abolish slavery here.

IS THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY WITHIN THE COMPETENCY OF LEGISLATION?

Having thus shown that the language of the grant of power to legislate for this District, necessarily, in the absence of express limitation, extends to every possible "case" of legislation, and that this is in accordance both with ancient construction and modern practice, I come to consider some objections which are urged against the exercise of the power.

It is said that it is not competent for legislative power to abolish slavery; and that, inasmuch as the grant of power to Congress must necessarily be limited to "cases" within the competency of legislation, therefore the "all cases whatsoever" of the Constitution cannot be taken to embrace the "case" of slavery.

No legislative power is, I admit, competent to do every thing. It cannot, for example, act by law upon the consciences or the faith of men. It cannot compel or sanction the commission of crime. It cannot enact that husbands shall not protect their wives, or that parents shall not provide for their children, or that female chastity shall be exposed to violation; and so of many other cases I might specify. It cannot pass such laws, for the very same reason that it could not rightfully pass the laws by which slaves are holden here; and for the very reason why it is bound to repeal them, namely, because such laws are contrary to the great law of nature, which no human legislation may violate.

But what is it to abolish slavery? Slavery, it should be remembered, is the mere creature of statute, or positive law. It is unknown to the common law. "It is" (said Lord Mansfield, near seventy years ago, in the celebrated case of the negro Somerset, which every lawyer has of course read) "It is so odious, that nothing can be suffered to support it but positive law." What is it, then, to abolish slavery? It is simply to repeal the positive laws which sustain it—to open the foul dungeon, locked by the key of unjust legislation, and permit the slave to walk forth and breathe the pure, invigorating atmosphere of the common law. It is to restore to its just efficacy the great fundamental law of natural justice, on which the common law is founded—a law written upon every man's conscience and in every man's heart.

This Congress is called on to do by the petitions which we are now contriving means summarily to reject. It is by the statute laws of the United States, and by them alone, that men are made slaves in this District. The Congress of the United States have passed laws repealing the law of eternal justice; and the petitioners ask us to repeal the repealing laws, and restore the law repealed to its full force and efficacy. They ask us to remove the crushing wight we have placed upon the soul and the body of the slave, and permit him to rise up and walk. They ask this in the name of justice. And are we to be told that we have no power to grant their request? Had we power to enact these laws? Where did we get it? If the Constitution gave it, (which I deny,) does it not give us power to repeal them? Have we power to pass a law making men the property of their fellow men? and have we no power to pass a law restoring to them the ownership of themselves?

Will any one talk of vested rights, which we should thereby violate? I deny that there are, or ever can be, in justice, any vested rights in such a case. It has been said by a great statesman that "that is property which the law makes property." If by this proposition is meant that what the law makes property is property, according to law, I do not, of course, deny it. This would be merely saying that law is law. But if it is intended to affirm that what the law makes property is rightfully and justly property, then I deny it utterly. The law may make the declaration, and the power of the State may enforce it, and the community may, of necessity, submit; but, after all, it will be a mere law of force, and not of right, unless, according to the philosophy of the infidel Hobbes, "the sole foundation of right and wrong is the civil law." That is the philosophy for slavery, but not for the freedom which finds the rule of right and wrong in a higher law than that of the State.

Let me test this proposition to which I have referred, by an example. Suppose we enact a law declaring that the first red man from the Western wilds who may chance to fall within your power shall be your property. Would our law make him property? Would not the voice of nature, and the voice of this nation, unite in thundering an indignant no to such an inquiry?

Whence is derived the original idea of property? It is not the creature of statute law. There are no statutes declaring that lands and houses, and cattle, and the productions of human skill and industry, shall be property. There are statute laws regulating their alienation and descent, but none declaring that they may be the subjects of ownership by man. And this for the best of reasons. There is a law older than all human laws, and above all human laws, which has settled the matter. It is the law of nature; which is nothing more or less than the will of the great original proprietor. That proprietor never stamped on man the quality of property. He never authorized one man to own another man; nor did He ever authorize a Legislature to make a law giving such ownership. Ownership in man? You may as well talk of owning the stars or the sun. No. Man was made to be the owner of himself. Every quality of his noble nature, and every aspiration of his undying spirit, proclaim it.

Having shown that the Abolition of slavery is, upon the principles of natural justice, within the competency of legislation, let me now advert, briefly, to the history of Abolition, to show how extensively these principles have been acted on. It may surprise those who habitually regard Abolition as the mere fungus creation of moon-struck fanaticism, to learn the extent to which its "abstractions," as they are called in derision, have been actually made the basis of legislation. I hold in my hand the 5th number of the "Anti-slavery Examiner," in which I find the following very brief summary of the history of Abolition, which I beg permission to read:

"The Abolition decree of the Great Council of England was passed in 1102. The memorable Irish decree, 'that all English slaves in the whole of Ireland be immediately emancipated and restored to their former liberty,' was issued in 1171. Slavery in England was abolished by a general charter of emancipation in 1381. Passing over many instances of the abolition of slavery by law, both during the Middle Ages and since the Reformation, we find them multiplying as we approach our own times. In 1776, slavery was abolished in Prussia by special edict. In St. Domingo, Cayenne, Gaudaloupe, and Martinique, in 1794, where more than 600,000 slaves were emancipated by the French Government. In Java, 1811; in Ceylon, 1815; in Buenos Ayres, 1816; in St. Helena, 1819; in Colombia, 1821; by the Congress of Chili in 1821; in Cape Colony, 1823; in Malacca, 1825; in the southern provinces of Birmah, 1826; in Bolivia, 1826; in Peru, Guatemala, and Montevideo, 1828; in Jamaica, Barbadoes, the Bermudas, the Bahamas, Aquilla, Mauritius, St. Christopher's, Nevis, the Virgin Islands, (British.) Antigua, Montserrat, Dominica, St. Vincent's, Grenada, Berbice, Tobago, St. Lucia, Trinidad, Honduras, Demerara, Essequibo, and the Cape of Good Hope, on the 1st of August, 1834. But, waiving details, suffice it to say that England, France, Spain, Portugal, Denmark, Russia, Austria, Prussia, and Germany, have all, and often, given their testimony to the competency of the legislative power to abolish slavery. In our own country, the Legislature of Pennsylvania passed an act of abolition in 1780, Connecticut in 1784, Rhode Island in 1784, New York in 1799, New Jersey in 1804, Vermont by Constitution in 1777, Massachusetts in 1780, and New Hampshire in 1784."

Here, sir, are the "abstractions" of Abolition, embodied in the legislation of Europe and America during the last five hundred years; and yet we are told that legislative power is incompetent to the abolition of slavery!

To the evidence thus furnished of the recognition of the competency of legislative power to abolish slavery, by its actual abolition, I may add the admission of it clearly implied in the Constitutions of five of the slaveholding States of this Union—namely, those of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky, and Arkansas—all of which expressly prohibit the Legislatures of those States from passing laws for emancipating slaves without the consent of their owners—thereby admitting that, without such prohibition, the power to pass such laws would exist.

To all this I might add the authority of numerous distinguished names from among slaveholding statesmen and jurists of our country; such as Pinckney and Martin of Maryland, and Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Henry, Pendleton, Mason, Wythe, Lee, and St. George Tucker, of Virginia. I shall refer more fully to the declarations of some of them hereafter, for another purpose. I will only here say, that General Washington repeatedly declared that the abolition of slavery ought to be effected "by legislative authority," and that "at a period not remote."

But I have further authority on this point, in the action of this Government itself, to which I desire now to call your attention, and in which you will find the power of abolishing slavery exercised in cases in which it was much less clearly authorized than it is in the case before us.

The abolition of the slave trade, no one will deny, involves the great principle of the right to abolish slavery. That trade on the high seas, in American vessels, Congress has abolished, or attempted to abolish. It has authorized the commanders of its armed vessels to capture the slaveship, take from its owner his cargo of men, and bring in his vessel for condemnation, and himself for trial as a pirate.

Now, by what authority has Congress thus interfered to wrest from citizens of the United States men bought with their money? By what authority has it interfered with "vested rights?" By what authority does it thus take "private property?" Does the Constitution say that Congress may legislate in "all cases whatsoever" touching the African slave trade? No. It simply declares that "the Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations." It is upon the foundation of this simple grant of power that Congress has reared its structure of slave-trade-prohibiting legislation, and has brought up, for the top-stone of the noble edifice, the punishment of death.

But further. Congress, by an act passed on the 7th of April, 1798, prohibited, under a heavy penalty, the importation of slaves from any place without the limits of the United States, into the Territory of Mississippi; and declared that, upon such importation, such slaves should be free. It also, on the 26th of March, 1801, enacted a similar prohibition of the importation of slaves into the Territory of Orleans, with a similar provision for their freedom.

By what authority were these abolition acts passed? Simply in virtue of that clause of the Constitution which declares that "the Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States;" a power by no means as clearly reaching the "case" of abolition, as that of legislating "in all cases whatsoever" within and for the "ten miles square." Let it not be said that the prohibitions to which I have just alluded were enacted under the authority of that clause of the Constitution to which I have before referred the abolition of the foreign slave trade, since the authority derived from that clause, to prohibit the importation of slaves, was prohibited to be exercised prior to the year 1808; while these acts prohibiting their importation into the Territories of Mississippi and Orleans were passed in 1798 and 1804.

But there is a still more striking illustration of the pushing of legislation to "the verge" of constitutional power in favor of human liberty, in the celebrated ordinance of 1787 "for the government of the Territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio." The sixth of the "articles of compact" of that ordinance declares that "there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said Territory, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes." This article not only prohibited the future introduction of slaves into the Northwestern Territory, but, in effect, abolished the slavery which then existed there. This is sufficiently obvious from the terms of the ordinance. And such is the effect which has been given to it by judicial decision. I refer to the case of Harvey and others vs. Decker and Hopkins, decided by the Supreme Court of Mississippi, in the year 1818.—Walker's reports, p. 36.

This was the case of three slaves who had been taken by Decker from Virginia to the Northwestern Territory, in 1784, where they remained until after the ordinance of 1787, and until the year 1816. How the case came up for adjudication in Mississippi does not appear. It was fully argued upon a motion for a new trial, and the Court decided that the slaves were emancipated by the ordinance of '87. One of the points made in the case was, that whatever might be the effect of the ordinance, the slaves were emancipated by the Constitution of Indiana, adopted in 1816. This was resisted on the ground that to give it such an effect would be to violate vested rights. The decision of the court on this point, coming from the highest judicial tribunal of a slave State, is worthy of special notice.

"What (say the court) are these vested rights? Are they derived from nature, or from the municipal law? Slavery is condemned by reason and the laws of nature. It exists, and can only exist through municipal regulations; and, in matters of doubt, is it not an unquestioned rule that courts must lean in favorem vitæ et libertatis? Admitting it was a doubtful point whether the Constitution was to be considered prospective in its operation or not, the defendants say, You take from us a vested right arising from municipal law. The petitioners say, You would deprive us of a natural right guarantied by the ordinance and Constitution? How should the court decide, if construction was really to determine it? In favor of liberty."

That the practical effect of the ordinance was to emancipate the slaves within the Territory at the time of its adoption, (and that, too, let it be remembered, without compensation, appears from the fact that slaveholders in the Territory petitioned Congress for a repeal of that part of the ordinance touching the subject of slavery, upon the ground that it had such an effect. I refer to the memorial of "the inhabitants of the counties of St. Clair and Randolph," Illinois, presented to Congress on the 12th of January, 1796. It is an interesting document, embodying as it does the principal arguments now urged, and always urged, against the emancipation of slaves without the consent of their owners; and showing the tenacity with which slavery clings to its wrongful possessions. Let me state the substance of it.

The memorialists declared the ordinance to be contrary to a fundamental principle in all free countries, "that no ex post facto law should ever be made." They stated that they were, at the date of the ordinance, possessed of a number of slaves, which the sixth article "seemed to deprive them of, without their consent or concurrence;" and they complained that the effect of that article was to deprive them, not only of the slaves holden by them at its date, but—what was a great grievance!—of the children of those slaves born after that date; their right to whom, they affirmed—and, as I think, with great truth—to be as indefeasible as the right of their parents. They close their complaint by saying that, so far as it respected them, the ordinance was altogether ex parte; and that, if they had been consulted, they would never have made a compact depriving them of their most valuable property.

Such was the ordinance of 1787—an ordinance passed unanimously, with the exception of a single vote. It is worthy of remark that, although this ordinance was drawn by a distinguished member from Massachusetts, [Mr. DANE,] yet the idea of abolishing slavery in the Northwestern Territory was originally brought out by Mr. Jefferson, having been suggested by him in 1784, in his report, as chairman of a committee of Congress, of a plan for the government of the Territory.

And now, sir, by what authority did the Congress of '87 thus abolish slavery in the Northwestern Territory? Was there any power to do it conferred by the Articles of Confederation which will at all compare with the authority given to Congress in the present Constitution to abolish slavery here? None will pretend it. And yet the ordinance was passed, and slavery abolished—so strong was the anti-slavery feeling of that day—so ready were the men of the Revolution to strain authority to the very utmost, for the purpose of banishing slavery from the land which freemen's blood had been profusely poured out to redeem from oppression's power.

OBJECTION—PROPERTY CANNOT BE TAKEN WITHOUT PROCESS OF LAW, NOR WITHOUT COMPENSATION.

But it is said that the power to legislate "in all cases whatsoever" is restrained from abolishing slavery, by the fifth of the amendments to the Constitution, which declares that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law." My reply to this is, that the term "property," as used in the amendment, cannot be there taken to mean slaves because the Constitution itself calls them persons, and treats them as such. They are described in the second section of the fourth article as "persons held to service or labor;" and in the second section of the first article, which provides for their being represented in this body, they are spoken of as "all other persons." If, then, it had been intended to prohibit the taking of slaves "without due process of law," then the amendment should have so described them. The Constitution must be made its own interpreter; and it calls them "persons." No mere intendment, therefore, can include them within the meaning of the term "property."

If it be said that this construction would not make the Constitution prohibit individuals from depriving slaveholders of their slaves without process of law, I admit it. The guarantee extending, for the reason mentioned, in nowise to slaves, their "owners" are, of course, left to their rights as existing independent of the guarantee.

The honorable member from Georgia [Mr. COOPER] refers to that clause of the amendment which prohibits the "taking of private property for public use without just compensation," and finds in that an argument against abolishing slavery. "Is it pretended (says he) that this Government has a 'public use' for this property?" Sir, I admit that Abolition does not take for "public use." But I, at the same time, maintain that it does not take at all, within the meaning of the Constitution. It performs a nobler work than taking slaves for public use. It takes off from them the crushing weight of laws which consign them, without compensation, to the use of others, and restores them to the use of themselves. This is Abolition.

But I have another reply to the argument drawn from the amendment of the Constitution referred to. It is, that the Government of the United States has always refused to recognise slaves "as property," for which "compensation" might be claimed under the Constitution. In numerous cases in which they were taken into the service of their masters as waiters, and killed in the service, has Congress refused compensation, though it has uniformly made it for horses and other property destroyed by the enemy while employed in such service.

But, what is more directly to the point now before us, Congress has, in passing laws providing compensation for property impressed into the service—"taken for public use"—expressly refused to include slaves. Thus, when the act of the 9th of April, 1816, "authorizing the payment for the property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States," was under discussion, Mr. Maryatt, of South Carolina, moved to amend the section which provided payment for impressed horses, carts, &c. so as to include all other property lost in the service. He particularly called the attention of the House to the cases of slaves used as drivers of wagons, as sailors, laborers, &c. impressed into the service, and lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy. His motion was negatived by a large majority. A similar motion was made by Mr. Forsyth, on the 24th of January, 1825, to amend the bill authorizing further payment to sufferers during the war, and with a similar result.

In addition to all this, the House of Representatives repeatedly refused, upon the most pressing and urgent applications of Francis Larche, to make compensation for his slave, impressed into the service at New Orleans, in the winter of 1814-'15, and killed in the service. A report of the Committee of Claims in this case may be found in the third volume of the Reports of Committees, 1st Session, 21st Congress, No. 401; in which numerous cases of rejected applications for compensation for slaves killed in the service are referred to.

CONSENT OF THE PEOPLE OF THE DISTRICT.

It is, in the next place, said that Congress may not abolish slavery here without the consent of the people of this District. This objection has received the sanction of my venerable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] in an address to the people of the United States since the last session of Congress, and deserves, for that reason, if for no other, to be well considered. I understand the venerable member to have placed this objection on the ground that it is against the great leading principle of our institutions—that of self-government—that the people should be acted on by legislation without their consent. I admit the correctness of the principle, but deny that it sustains the objection. It will not certainly be claimed that the consent must, in all cases, be expressed. There are very few now on the stage who expressly assented to the Constitution when it was adopted; yet nobody denies that we are all bound by it in virtue of an assent, implied. And is not the assent of the people of this District to our legislation implied, upon the same principles? When the territory composing this District was a part of Virginia and Maryland, the assent of its inhabitants to that Constitution which authorizes Congress to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever was, in effect, given by the adoption of that Constitution by Virginia and Maryland; and the present inhabitants of the District are bound to submit to that legislation upon precisely the same principle that obliges any of the States to submit to any legislation of Congress constitutionally exercised.

If this reasoning be correct, the assent of the people of this District to the constitutional action of Congress is implied; and to require that it be expressed asserts a principle which would absolve the people of the whole country from all obligation to obey the laws either of the States or of the nation.

And here it should be borne in mind that the objection does not apply solely to legislation for the abolition of slavery, but that, from its nature, it is applicable to all subjects of legislation affecting the interests of the people of the District; so that the principle it involves strikes at the whole power of Congress supposed to be conferred in the clause of the Constitution we have been considering.

But let us see how the new principle contended for is to be carried out. How is the new piece of umber to be put into the building which has been so "fitly framed?"

There must, it is said, be an express assent of the people of the District. How is that assent to be obtained? By what authority? Shall meetings be called? How and by whom? And when they are called, and come to act—upon what principle—by virtue of what organic law shall the decision of the majority bind the minority, or bind those who do not choose to attend?

And, then, in what form and under what circumstances is the assent to be given? Must the law which we may pass be submitted to the people in their assemblies for their sanction? Or shall they meet beforehand, and give Congress power to exercise legislation in certain cases or upon certain subjects, leaving to Congress the power to settle the details of its own action?

Congress has hitherto always proceeded on the ground that its power to act was derived from the Constitution. And when the inquiry has arisen, what are we authorized to do? Wise and learned men have gravely looked into the Constitution to determine the question. But, under the new doctrine, the case is entirely changed; and our wise men must lay aside their spectacles, shut the book of the Constitution, and go about to inquire, what power do the people of this District think we have a right to exercise? Or what power are they disposed to grant us? We used to think we must inquire of the Constitution to know what we might do, especially as we were solemnly sworn to support it; but now we must inquire of the people of this District! Who ever heard of such a Government as this would be if the doctrine I am combating should prevail! Surely I need say no more to prove—what every body must see—that it puts an end to the government of Congress over this District, and abolishes the seventeenth clause of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution as completely as some of the "men and women" of the North desire to see slavery and the slave trade abolished.

IMPLIED FAITH TO VIRGINIA AND MARYLAND.

It is further objected to the exercise of our power of abolishing slavery and the slave trade here, that it would be a violation of the "good faith to Virginia and Maryland, implied in the cession and acceptance" by Congress to the territory which forms this District.

"Good faith implied in the cession and acceptance." What does this mean? It must mean this: that there was something in the cession and acceptance, or in the circumstances connected with them, that raised a confidence in Virginia and Maryland that the Government of the United States would not abolish slavery or the slave trade in the District; this confidence, from whichever of these sources derived, carrying with it a corresponding pledge on the part of the United States that such action should not take place.

Now it is manifest that there could have been no such pledge implied, because there could properly have been none such expressed. Congress had no power to make such pledge. It would have been utterly void, if made, because the Constitution having given to Congress power to "exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" over the District, no one Congress can, by any act, restrict a subsequent Congress to the exercise of that power in some cases only; if it could, it would have the power to alter the Constitution by act of legislation.

But, waiving this, let us look into the acts of cession and of acceptance, and see whether any thing can be found from which the supposed confidence could be raised on one side, or the supposed pledge implied on the other.

The acts of cession, one dated December 3, 1789, and the other December 19, 1791, are as follows:

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That a tract of country not exceeding ten miles square, or any lesser quantity, to be located within the limits of the State, and in any part thereof, as Congress may by law direct, shall be, and the same is hereby, forever ceded and relinquished to the Congress and Government of the United States, in full and absolute right, and exclusive jurisdiction as well of soil as of persons residing, or to reside, thereon, pursuant to the tenor and effect of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the Government of the United States."

Such were the cessions. "Full and absolute right and exclusive jurisdiction of soil and persons residing or to reside thereon." And that there should be no hesitancy on the part of the United States to accept the cessions, on account of any supposed failure to make the grants they contained coextensive with the grant of power to Congress in the Constitution, it was added, "pursuant to the tenor and effect of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States."

The acts of Congress accepting these cessions are mere acts of acceptance, containing nothing which has the slightest bearing on the present question.

Now, what is there in these cessions and their acceptance to raise an expectation on one side, or imply a pledge on the other, that the power to abolish slavery was to become a practical exception from the "exclusive jurisdiction" expressed in the cessions, or from the authority to legislate "in all cases whatsoever," given in the Constitution, to which they refer? What sort of "good faith" is it which, in the face of so plain a grant of all power, excepts, without any language expressing or implying such exception, the important power now in question? Could not the ceding States have incorporated in their acts a proviso that nothing herein contained shall be construed to vest in the United States, or to recognise, in any manner, the power to abolish slavery in the ceded territory? And shall they, having failed to make, or attempt to make such stipulation, now claim that it was implied "in the cessions and acceptance of the territory? This omission to except the case of the abolition of slavery is the more significant because there was, in these acts, a reservation really made, namely, "that nothing herein contained shall be construed to vest in the United States any right of property in the soil, or to effect the rights of individuals therein, otherwise than the same shall or may be transferred by such individuals to the United States."

Now, why was there not connected with this reservation the stipulation I have suggested in favor of slavery? It could not have been for want of caution in the Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland; for there was a very extreme caution exercised in making the reservation as to the soil could—since it is quite obvious that, without such reservation, no property of individuals in the soil have passed to the United States. Nor could the omission have been the effect of an impression that the grant of power by the Constitution to Congress was not full and complete, so as not to require an express exception, if any was desired or intended; because the subject of the extent of the powers granted to Congress over the District had then recently been discussed, as I have shown, in the Virginia Convention, where it had been maintained that the power was "unlimited"—extending to "every possible case." Neither could the omission have resulted from a supposition that, as the Constitution had granted to Congress power to legislate "in all cases whatsoever," it would be incompetent for Virginia and Maryland to make the stipulation that it should not legislate in a particular case—since it had been expressly declared in the Virginia Convention by Mr. Madison, the father of the Constitution, "that the ceding States might settle the terms of the cession," and "make what stipulation they please in it." Nor could the omission to make the stipulation have resulted from an impression that it was unnecessary to stipulate against the exercise of a power not within the competency of legislation; since the competency of legislative power to abolish slavery was then universally conceded.

Whence, then, the very significant and important omission to settle this question by a stipulation in the acts of cession? There can be but one answer to this question; and that is, that Virginia and Maryland did not intend to make such a stipulation; they did not, in fact, desire to make it. The subject of the power of Congress, under the general grant of power to legislate in all cases whatsoever, did not escape the attention of the leading men in those States. They knew that by the cessions they parted with all jurisdiction over the Territory; that Congress was made its exclusive Legislature; and that legislative power was then relied on as a legitimate means for abolishing slavery; and yet, with their eyes thus wide open, they ceded the ten miles square, and expressly confirmed the ample power over it granted to Congress by the Constitution, without the slightest attempt to impose any limitation whatever upon the exercise of that power in the abolition of slavery.

While the supposition of an "implied faith" to Virginia and Maryland is thus clearly negatived by the terms of the cessions, and the significant omission of any stipulation in them in favor of slavery, there are other considerations which render it manifest that no such limitation can be implied.

What is the ground of the supposed "good faith" to Virginia and Maryland? It is the assumption that the abolition of slavery and the slave trade here would injuriously effect the interests of those States. But is legislation on the subject of slavery the only legislation which the principle of this objection would reach? Is there, in fact, any legislation capable of affecting the interests of the neighboring States, to which it might not be applied? Might it not, for example, reach the criminal code which we might enact for the District? or the licensing of lotteries or gaming establisements in it? or our legislation upon the subject of the currency here?

Does not the principle of this objection strip us of all power, not only over the subject of slavery, but over every other subject, or legislation on which might affect the feelings or the interests of Virginia and Maryland, and send us, cap in hand, to those States, in the attitude of inquiring what we may do in the execution of our powers of legislation? Who is willing to take this attitude? Who dreamed, at the adoption of the Constitution, that the Federal Government would ever be brought to the necessity of taking it?

And, then, the same difficulty would exist in case the people of the District should—as it is contended they must do—give their assent to the action of Congress abolishing slavery; for the abolition would be just as injurious to Virginia and Maryland, if effected by Congress with the consent of the people of the District, as without it. Indeed, the principle of the objection would be just as fatal to the right of the people themselves to abolish slavery here, as the right of Congress to do it. The objection, in fact, places both Congress and the people in the same position, in regard to abolition, as are the individual citizens of Virginia and Maryland. It is one of the most unjust and oppressive features of their slave systems, (a feature which marked the cruel and sanguinary system of Spartan slavery!) that individuals are prohibited from emancipating their slaves, except upon condition of the banishment of the emancipated; though a dispensation may be, and sometimes is, granted by special acts of legislation.

The cruel policy which compels the citizens of those States (where the rights of conscience are carefully guarded in other respects, but flagrantly violated in this!) to hold their brethren in bondage, against their strongest convictions of duty, and the noblest impulses of a generous nature, is thus extended even to the Government of the United States; so that, although under a conviction of the claims of justice, it might desire to abolish slavery here, and thus cease to stand before the world in the character of a slaveholding Government, it could not do it without going, with the slaveholders of Virginia and Maryland, to the Legislatures of those States for the enactment of dispensing statutes!

Such is the humiliating position in which the slave power seeks to place the Government of this Republic!

It being thus apparent that there is nothing in the "cessions and acceptance" implying the "good faith" which is relied on; and that such implication, carried out, would subject Congress to an absurd and degrading subserviency to Virginia and Maryland; the question recurs, where shall we find this mysterious "good faith," which is in every body's mouth, but which nobody can define, and nobody seems perfectly to understand?

Mr. Speaker, there never was any such thing as the "implied faith" that is contended for. It did not enter the conceptions of either of the parties when the cessions were made and accepted. Virginia and Maryland now desire to limit the action to Congress on the subject of slavery. They then desired no such thing.

If the objection were placed on the ground of the present wishes of Virginia and Maryland, then I say give them all the effect to which the desires of those States are fairly entitled; but, when they place in the high and imposing ground of a breach of implied faith, my reply to them is, that there is not and never was any such implied faith as they contend for; that the change of their minds since 1789, does not change the character of the enactment and acceptance of the cessions; and that they must, therefore, be content to abide by them according to their fair import.

Indeed, I go further, and say that the state of public sentiment on the subject of slavery at that period, and the universal expectation then entertained that slavery would, at no distant day, be abolished, not only negative the idea of the implied faith contended for, but furnish the strongest ground for an opposite implication. I shall presently, for a more general purpose, produce such evidence of the public sentiment and expectation as will, I trust, satisfy the most incredulous that, instead of objecting to the action of Congress on the subject of slavery here, the States of Virginia and Maryland were bound in good faith, long since, to have abolished slavery within their own limits; and that their neglect to do so is just ground of complaint on the part of the United States. In no part of the Union were there louder and more bitter denunciations against slavery than in these same States of Virginia and Maryland when the Territory was ceded and accepted. It was not only universally admitted, as I have shown, that the abolition of slavery was within the competency of legislation, but that it must and would be effected, to use Washington's language, "at no distant day." The cessions of this Territory, therefore, it must be apparent to all, were accepted by Congress with the expectation, well understood by Virginia and Maryland, that the District about to set apart for the seat of Government would soon cease to be surrounded by a slave population—a consideration which may well be supposed to have had great influence in inducing the decision of Congress to locate the seat of Government here.

Instead, therefore, of the present agitation of the subject of slavery and the slave trade here being justly to be regarded (to use the language of Mr. Van Buren to the North Carolina Committee) "as a surprise upon the people of Maryland and Virginia," the surprise should be on the other side; and, instead of "being confident (to use his language) that, if the state of things which now exists had been apprehended by those States, the cession of the District would not have been made," no man can consider the state of feeling and expectation in regard to slavery at that time, without being confident that, 'if the present state of things had been apprehended by" the Middle and Northern States, "the cession would not have been" accepted.

Such being the true state of this case—such the "faith" really "implied" in the history and spirit of the times to which I have referred, is it not amazing to witness what is now passing? Instead of the redemption of the implied pledge to remove from around this seat of Government the curse of slavery, it has been permitted greatly to increase; and this very city has become the great slave mart of large portions of these States—insomuch that the Representative from the free States, and their constituents who come to this city to witness the deliberations of Congress, are compelled to witness the driving of coffles of slaves through its principle avenues, and by the very doors of this Capitol—to witness, in fact, the slave trade, with all its infernal machinery of prisons, whips, chains, and slave ships—a trade little less horrible—in some of its aspects more so—than that whose prosecution on the high seas our laws have subjected to the punishment of death.

And now, to crown the whole, the very petitions—prayers of citizens of the United States, asking, in the name of humanity, the abolition, not of slavery in Virginia and Maryland, but of slavery and the slave trade here, are sneered at, and rejected without a hearing; while the petitioners are branded as "desperate and despicable fanatics" on this floor.

Mr. Speaker, need I ask who has the right to complain of a violation of "good faith" in regard to the matter of slavery here?

IMPLIED PLEDGE OF THE NORTH TO THE SOUTH IN ADOPTING THE CONSTITUTION.

I come now to another branch of the subject of implied faith of a more general nature; I mean the "implied faith" that Congress will not legislate on the subject of slavery here, and that the people of the North will not agitate the subject—drawn from what is called "the compromise which lies at the basis of our Federal compact."

I do not here refer to the assertion often made that "slavery, as it exists at the South, is guaranteed by the Constitution," because such an assertion has not even plausibility enough to entitle it to notice in a grave discussion; though there are thousands, probably, who really believe that there is such a guarantee—which those who claim the right of free discussion are wickedly violating. But I state the objection as it is expressed by Mr. Van Buren in his North Carolina correspondence. He did not place it on the ground of a guarantee in the Constitution, or inferrible from the Constitution, but of a faith implied in "the compromise which lies at the basis of the Federal compact." This is surely sufficiently indefinite for the largest convenience of non-committalism.

The compromise! Where is it? And what is it? Those who rely on it profess to infer it from the history of the proceedings on the question of slavery in the convention that formed the Constitution. What is that history? Briefly this:

Slavery existed in a portion of the States. A desire existed at the North to introduce an express provision into the Constitution for its abolition. This the South resisted; and the Constitution was adopted without such provision.

These are the facts. What then was the compromise? A compromise involves a mutual concession. What did the North concede? She conceded the point in dispute. And what was that? Simply whether the Constitution should abolish slavery. How did this concession pledge the North not to speak, write, print, or petition against slavery?

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this simple statement of the case makes it almost too plain for argument. The mind is actually compelled to labor to find even plausible ground for the inference of the guarantee relied on; and yet that inference is maintained with great pertinacity. It is said that slavery was an exciting subject, and that the convention, having agreed to drop it, and make no provision to abolish slavery, there therefore arose an implied guarantee that it should be no more discussed; but that the North should forever after hold her peace!

Now, however incredible this may appear to men of common sense, it is really true that there is a sort of sense uncommon enough to draw such an inference. I have no doubt it will amaze many a farmer, when he sits down to read his newspaper, to find that this is the state of the case; and he will be tempted to say that slavery makes as bad work with logic as it does with human rights. What! says he; a guarantee that I shall say nothing about slavery, because the men that made the Constitution, after talking about it awhile, stopped talking, and made a Constitution that did'nt abolish it? This is strange doctrine. I do not agree to it; for, in the first place, these slaves, if they are black, are my brethren. The good book says that God made of one blood all nations of men; and these slaves are men; and they have feelings, too, as well as I, and rights, as well as I; and I can't help feeling for them, and saying what I think about their being held in bondage. In fact, I don't see why the men that pretend to own them might not just as well pretend to own me, and come here and take me. And, indeed, I had almost as lief they would, as to stop my talking about their enslaving the black men; for how can a man help talking when he feels as much as I do? And then, if I have a mind to write, and send it to the printer, I should be glad to know why I may not do it, if I do give the slaveholders a little scoring. But my speaking and writing will go but little ways if slavery has a right to say to the printer that he shall not print what I write.

And then I understand that there are six or seven thousand slaves in the District of Columbia, and that there are pens there, right in sight of the Capitol, where slaves that have been bought are shut up, until there are enough of them got together to send off to market, away to the South, where they will never see their husbands, nor wives, nor parents, nor brothers, nor sisters, any more. I declare it makes me feel bad to think about them. And I understand that Congress has a right to say that these six or seven thousand slaves shall not be slaves any more; and, also, that slaves shall not be bought and shut up there any more, to be sent away to the South. Now I am told here, in this newspaper, that because the men that made the Constitution stopped talking about slavery, I am prohibited from sending my petition to Congress asking it to exercise its power about slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

I know it is said I may petition; but I do not see what use there is in sending my petition to my representative, if, the moment he gets up with it in his hand, it is to be considered as objected to, and the question about its being received is to be considered as laid upon the table. Now, I consider that it all amounts to saying, in a sort of back handed way—and I dislike it the more for that—that my petition shall not be received or considered; and I would as lief they would say that I shall not write it and send it as to do this; for if they will not hear me, what's the use in sending my petition, and asking my representative to present it?

Now, as I said, I do not agree to all this. These rights of speaking, and writing, and printing, and petitioning are great rights, which I am thinking these Constitution-makers would have had no business to stop the exercise of, even if they had put it in the Constitution; and certainly that it cannot be stopped merely because they stopped talking about slavery; for, if I understand the matter, that stopping only meant that they would say no more about abolishing slavery by the Constitution; and what shows this is, that they went to talking about slavery, and writing about it, and printing about it, and having societies about it, and petitioning about it, right off after the Constitution was formed.

And, besides all this, the Constitution, if I remember right, says that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people to petition for a redress of grievances. Now, I think it is pretty essentially abridging these rights to say that I shall not speak nor write, nor have my writing printed, about slavery; and that I shall not petition against slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia; for, if there ever was any thing that grieved me, it is that slavery, and that buying and selling, and driving and shipping to market, of men, women, and children in that District.

The good book, again, tells me to remember those that are in bonds as bound with them; (and this—as bound with them—I take it, means something;) and yet I must not say, or write, or print a word about my feelings, because the Constitution-makers stopped talking about slavery while they were making the Constitution. And then, again, I may pray, and do pray every day, to my Heavenly Father for the slaves, and His ears are open to my prayer; and yet, Congress shuts its ears, and won't hear me, because the Constitution-makers stopped talking about slavery while they were hammering out the Constitution! How absurd it is to suppose an implied guarantee against the exercise of these rights, when that very Constitution declares that they shall not be abridged, and does not make any exception of the case of slavery! I am told it was Virginia that was the means of putting this into the Constitution; and I thank Virginia for it. Now, it seems to me that, if they had meant to except the case of slavery, they would have said so right out, and not left it to this loose sort of understanding, which, after all, I do not see was any understanding at all.

The fact is, it's a pretty great affair to take away these natural rights of speaking and printing and petitioning; and especially to take them away in such a case as this. And then, to take them away by implication, too. Why, if I had seen it in the Constitution itself, I should hardly have believed my eyes; and yet they say I am deprived of these rights by implication! Now, it seems to me that in such a case as this, if there is to be any thing implied, it should be the other way; that is, in favor of my natural rights, and especially in favor of the rights of the poor slave, that I think about just as much as I do about my own.

And now, to sum up the whole matter, it is my opinion that this implication ought to be turned the other end foremost. That's the natural way; and, besides, I have heard it said that when the Constitution was made, every body expected that slavery would be abolished in a little while; and, as I don't see how that could be done unless folks were to be allowed to speak and print against it. I think that is evidence that the understanding was that way.

Now, Mr. Speaker, look at this ploughman, as he lays down his newspaper, takes off his spectacles, and thus reasons, and tell me if his argument is not conclusive and unanswerable.

Such, sir, is the common sense which is at work among the people upon this question, which slavery has so much mystified; and this is the way the cobweb arguments that have been elaborated for its protection are swept away. You will perceive that my farmer has brought his reasoning to a very important conclusion, namely, that all implication in such a case should be in favor of natural rights; and, therefore, should, in this case, be exactly the reverse of what is claimed in behalf of slavery. And is he not correct? Is it not demanded by the common sense and unperverted feelings of all men, that implication shall never be permitted to take away or abridge such important rights as those of speech and the press, and petition, or be used to sustain such a usurpation as that of slavery? Does not natural justice revolt at it? Does not humanity, in her breathless struggle for victory over oppression, after a contest of ages, cry out against it? And yet this very implication is now claimed to "lie at the basis of our Federal compact!"

An implied pledge that the rights of speech, and the press, and petition, shall be sacrificed in favor of slavery? What; sir, would have been the sensation in the Convention of '87 if such a pledge had been presented for its action, in the form of an article of the Constitution? What expressions of amazement and indignation would have lowered in the countenances of Washington and Madison and Franklin upon its announciation; and how would its adoption have shaken the country with a very earthquake of indignant feeling! And yet now! "the compromise of the Constitution," and "the guarantee of the Constitution," and "the implied faith of the Constitution" in favor of slavery are as familiar with Southern gentlemen, in their discussions of this subject, as household words. Sir, it is time this delusion were dispelled, and the Constitution, in its true relation to this great question of slavery, properly understood.

Though, Mr. Speaker, the ploughman's common sense argument seems to me quite sufficient to settle this question, yet there are other reasons, not, of course, so readily occurring to him, which greatly strengthen the conclusion to which he arrives, namely, that the implication, instead of being against the free exercise of the rights of speech and the press, and petition, was clearly in its favor. This implication necessarily grows out of the Union itself—that very Union from which the contrary implication is attempted to be drawn.

The Union gave to the North a new and deep interest in the question of slavery. Without the Union, the people of the North would have felt the strong impulse of motives to which no heart can be insensible, urging the consideration of a subject so deeply interesting to the human race. But, when the Union was formed, they came to sustain to slavery a new relation, involving interests and rights having important bearings on the present question.

In adopting the Constitution, the North entered into a stipulation to deliver up fugitives from oppression—a stipulation whose execution is abhorrent to humanity, and from which the whole soul of a freeman instinctively revolts. Provisions also were conceded whereby the power of the whole Union was pledged to protect the States from invasion, and to put down domestic violence. The relation of all these stipurations to slavery is obvious, The burden they imposed is obvious—a burden rendered severer by the unnatural character of stipulations to aid in sustaining slavery. Nature itself dictates that such stipulations should never, by any construction, be extended beyond the strict "letter of the bond;" and that, while a literal compliance is yielded, the largest liberty should be allowed to the burdened party to use all lawful means to remove the necessity of a compliance. Thus, for example: If I were bound by specific obligation to deliver up to my neighbor his fugitive slaves and to assist him in putting down their efforts to regain their natural rights, and to defend him from attacks which might be invited, and rendered more hazardous to him by their presence in his family, every body would say that this very obligation would give me a peculiar claim to use all reasonable means to persuade him to emancipate them, and thus release me from the burdensome and unnatural obligation.

The North is, moreover, bound to assist in providing "for the common defence," as well as specifically to defend each State from invasion, and to put down domestic violence. And will it be asked what has the North to do with slavery, when it is considered what an element of national weakness exists in the two millions and three-quarters of slaves within the limits of the nation? The South now say—hands off; let us alone! But should they come to feel the combined pressure of foreign war and domestic insurrection—which may Heaven avert!—should not we of the North be bound by the Constitution to pour out our blood and expend our treasure in grappling with slavery—it might be, in its strongest paroxysms of despair and desperation? And shall we not be permitted to ask our Southern brethren to avert this danger, by converting these millions of natural enemies into grateful friends, and thus turning this element of weakness into an element of strength? Can any thing be more reasonable than this?

I know the South affect to despise these stipulations of the Constitution, and say, we ask none of your help—we can take care of ourselves. But who does not perceive the use which a foreign enemy might make of the slave population, now numbering a little less than three millions—a fearful number!—but rising, it may be, ten, fifteen, or twenty millions? Who can calculate the strength of the inducement that might be holden out to them? Freedom! What allies would this word raise up, and bring to the aid of an invader! And where then would be the boast, we want none of your help—we can take care of ourselves!

Think not, Mr. Speaker, that this is the mere creation of an excited fancy, introduced here to help out an argument for abolition. It is as impossible to contemplate the existence of a rapidly increasing slave population in our country without such forebodings as it would be to be unmindful of a magazine in presence of an enemy, with bomb-shells charged for its explosion. Whoever has read the debates in the Virginia Convention, in 1788, upon the United States Constitution, will remember the glowing picture of this danger drawn by Patrick Henry, and the argument he founded on it, that the obligation imposed on the General Government to "provide for the common defence" carried with it a right not only to say "that every black man must fight," but a right actually to abolish slavery within the States. It is not to my present purpose to discuss that question; but it is to ask whether there is not enough in the basis on which he founded his argument to justify the people of the North in the utmost exercise of their rights of speech and the press, and petition and legislation against slavery.

If there are any still disposed to regard with indifference the argument I have drawn from this source, let me commend to their special attention the extract which I will now read from a speech of Mr. Madison, in the first Congress, in 1789. Speaking of the abolition of the slave-trade, he says:

"I should venture to say it is as much for the interests of Georgia and South Carolina as of any State in the Union. Every addition they receive to the number of slaves tends to weaken them, and renders them less capable of self-defence. In case of hostilities with foreign nations, they will be the means of inviting attack, instead of repelling invasion. It is a necessary duty of the General Government to protect every part of the emdire against danger, as well internal as external. Every thing, therefore, which tends to increase this danger, though it may be a local affair, yet, if it involves national expense or safety, it becomes of concern to every part of the Union, and is a proper subject for the consideration of those charged with the general administration of the Government."

Thus you see, sir, that the very father of the Constitution—the man so eminently distinguished for his intelligence, his sound judgment, and his sober, practical views—perceived, and yielded to the force of the argument drawn from the weakness and the danger of slavery.

And, Mr. Speaker, how great'y is this argument strengthened by the rapid increase of the slave population; and especially by the obstinate determination evinced to resist all attempts to persuade to its abolition accompanied even by studied vindications of it as an institution to be sustained and cherished. Who will not feel impressed with a sense of this danger when he hears such declarations as the following from a Governor of one of the slave States of this Union:

"Domestic slavery, therefore, instead of being a political evil, is the corner stone of our republican edifice. No patriot who justly estimates our privileges will tolerate the idea of emancipation, at every period, however remote, or on any condition of pecuniary advantages, however favorable. I would as soon open a negotiation for selling the liberty of the State at once, as for making any stipulations for the ultimate emancipation of our slaves."

Having spoken of the attempts of those whom he calls "foreign incendiaries" to reason the South out of its suicidal attachment to slavery, he says:

"It is my deliberate opinion that the laws of every community should punish this species of interference by death without the benefit of clergy, regarding the authors of it as enemies of the human race!"

Such was the declaration of Governor McDuffie in a message to the Legislature of South Carolina in 1834; and it has since been followed by the notorious threat of hanging, made on the floor of the Senate of the United States.

Can any body fail to see, in the infatuation of all this, augmented danger in the institution of slavery?

But, Mr. Speaker, aside from all considerations of national hazard, or mere constitutional obligation of defence and protection, how strongly must the North feel impelled to take an intereset in the matter of slavery by the simple relation of brotherhood resulting from the Union. This can be better felt than described, but is nowhere better described than in the simple, touching declaration: "Whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honored, all the members rejoice with it." It is impossible to extinguish this feeling!

But, besides, let it be considered that, by coming into the Union, the North made slavery in a sense its own—that is, to the extent of the express stipulations to which I have referred. And it has since become emphatically its own, to the extent of slavery in this District, and a slave trade here as horrible and disgraceful as is to be found in Christendom. Has not the North, as well as the whole country, thus assumed a high responsibility to liberty and humanity? And may not the people of the North, and of every part of the United States, seek to discharge that responsibility by any and all the means which the full extent of power recognised in the Constitution shall warrant?

In asking, as is so often done, "What has the North to do with slavery?" it seems to be supposed that, because the North have no power to legislate slavery out of the slave States, therefore they have no right to attempt to reason it out, without reflecting that, while legislation by the Congress of the United States is limited by the grant of power in the Constitution, there is, and from the nature of the case can be, no such limitation to the exercise of moral power. Its legislation, so to speak, is not the creature of constitutional grant. It has a higher origin; it rests on a deeper foundation. Its jurisdiction is the world. It seeks no aid from civil power. It acts on mind, and with a mightier than the civil arm—with an energy which no such arm can resist. Wherever mind can come in contact with mind, through the agencies of speech and the press, there, restrained by nothing but truth and justice, it puts forth its energies, and hievesac its victories.

While the Constitution gave to "the people of the United States" no authority to repeal the slave laws of the States, and banish slavery from their borders, it left truth—omnipotent truth—truth unfettered—free as the spirit of man—to take the wings of the morning, and fly to the uttermost parts of the land. Instead of attempting the impossibility of binding it, the Constitution guarantied to it a tongue and a press, and left to go forth to its mighty conflict with error.

It seems to me that those who denied this freedom to truth, and claim that it is bound by constitutional fetters, do not reflect on the strange, anomalous condition in which they thus place the free States of this Union. To most of the civilized world we may freely utter the voice of truth on the subject of slavery, (for by what lines of latitude, or mountains, or oceans, can that voice be confined!) while to our Southern brethren we may not speak, because—they are our brethren! Were the Canadas slave States, we might bring to bear on them—as Great Britain has, through her West India emancipation, upon the Southern States of this Union—an anti-slavery influence which they would find it difficult to resist. Nothing but a wall reaching to heaven, and penetrating to the centre of the earth, could exclude that influence. And yet the Union of these States has reared upon "Mason and Dixon's line" that wall of separation! It leaves, indeed, a gate through which the North may pass, and must pass, when dangers threaten; but when we have poured out our blood to aid in protecting and securing slavery, we must retire, without uttering, on pain of death, one word of admonition against a continuance of the institution. We must fight and pay to suppress its insurrections, but may not reason and remonstrate to put an end to its injustice, and relieve the country from its danger. And this is the Union!

I have sometimes heard it said that, in forming the Union, the North took the South with the incumbrance of slavery, and must patiently bear its evils. But the South, it may with equal propriety be said, took the North with the incumbrance—if such it may be called—of freedom. Each necessarily subjected itself to the influence of the other—an influence exerted by the official intercourse growing out of a common Government, and the facilities of social and commercial intercourse resulting from the Union.

And, sir, the North has felt that influence, and still feels it. It has, as I shall soon show, felt it ever since the Government went into operation, in the control which slavery has maintained over its whole action. Where the balance of influence will ultimately fall, remains to be seen. If the free States are true to themselves and to the great principles of freedom, standing firm in their defence, there can be no doubt that those principles will finally triumph. But, to secure that result, there must be a better understanding of these principles, and more firmness in maintaining them, than I have ever been permitted to witness here.

There is, Mr. Speaker, something monstrous in the idea that this Union was formed to perpetuate slavery. Yet such is to be the result if the claims of the South are to be susta ned; for the Union is, in effect, thereby thrown around slavery as a shield of defence against the power of truth, which might otherewise be brought to bear against it. Before the Union, we might have spoken, and spoken with great effect. Without the Union we might now put forth our moral power in unison with the influence of British emancipation. But the Union has been formed, and—we must be silent! While the rest of the world is moving on this great question of human rights, we must be silent because we have formed the Union! This whole land is to be shrouded in the darkness of Egypt, and hushed in the silence of death on the great subject which is moving Christendom, because we have formed the Union!

Mr. Speaker, if this is to be the effect of the formation of this Union; if it is thus to become an instrument of perpetuating slavery, then should the preamble to the covenant of silence, the compact of iniquity, have been made to read thus: "We the people of the United States, in order to form a more imperfect Union, establish injustice, ensure domestic discord, provide for the common weakness, promote the general injury, and secure the course of slavery to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

Such, sir, should have been the preamble to the Constitution; for it would be perfectly descriptive of it if the Union of which it is the compact, is to become what the claims of the South would really make it—an instrument of perpetuating slavery.

It is urged as an argument for supdressing freedom of speech and the press, and petition on the subject of slavery, that the free exercise of these rights will have the effect of dissolving the Union. Now, sir, I maintain precisely the reverse of this. I maintain that this very suppression, if it can be effected, will, of itself, dissolve the Union. You might as well expect that the stopping up of Ætna's crater would not produce an earthquake, as that a dissolution of the Union would not follow such a suppression. Every man who knows any thing of the nature of the human soul, and the power of its agonizing sympathies with human suffering and oppression, must admit this. Beware how you trifle with these sympathies! Call them weakness: brand them as fanaticism: denounce them as incendiary. Yet they exist, and will exist, and ought to exist; and your contempt and abuse of them will only increase their intensity.

Sir, if you would preserve this Union, cease to treat thus contemptuously the best feelings of the human heart. Cease to hurl back in the faces of the men and women of the North their humble petitions, praying, in the name of our common humanity, that you would repeal your laws which hold their brethren in bondage. Sir, you owe it to them; you owe it to the Constitution; you owe it to the great principles of liberty which this nation drew in with the first breath of its existence, and which send the pulsations of health through every part of our Republican system, not to abridge the liberty of speech, and of the press, and of petition in connection with the subject of slavery. If you will assail these rights, let it be in connection with some other subject; but never—never in connection with this! Guard them with vestal vigilance. If slavery suffers from them, it must suffer. If it falls in its contest with "truth left free," then let it fall. Its fall will be the safety of the country and the perpetuity of the Union.

Mr. Speaker, is slavery to be put in competition with the freedom of speech, and of the press, and the right of petition? Which shall be surrendered, the slavery of the black man? or the noblest freedom of the white man? If both cannot live together, which shall die? Who can doubt; who can hesitate on such a question? And yet, sir, we are told that this contest between freedom and slavery was settled fifty years ago in favor of slavery; not by the Constitution; that would have been monstrous! but by implications growing out of "the compromise that lies at the basis of the Federal compact!" Sir, if this implication lies at the basis of the compact of our Union, then was the Union placed on a mine, to be shattered into a thousand fragments by its inevitable explosion.

And, sir, what I say of the effects of the abridgment of the speech and of the press, and of the right of petition, which is insisted on as a part of the "compromise," I must say of slavery itself. Its permanency is utterly incompatible with the permanency of this Union. Who can expect that a a free people can be held in fraternal embrace forever with a community where slavery is cherished and proclaimed as "the corner stone of Republican institutions?" The thing is impossibe. "The lily and the bramble may grow in social proximity, but liberty and slavery delight in separation." Such was the sentiment of Pinkney, uttered in the Maryland House of Delegates fifty years ago. And, sir, what he thus uttered as a general truth will, as sure as man is man, become history, if the South persist in maintaining slavery against the feelings of the North, and against the enlightened judgment and enlarged humanity of the civilized world. If the framers of the Constitution had attempted to from a compact of union specifically providing for the perpetuity of slavery, they would have been guilty of the most consummate folly; and yet we now hear of "the guarantees of the Constitution," and "the compromises of the Constitution" in favor of slavery! Sir, the guarantees were all the other way—guarantees drawn from the very nature of the Union, from the spirit of the times in which it was formed, and from the great principles which "lie at the basis" of all our cherished institutions.

While looking at the objection to the exercise by Congress of its power of abolishing slavery here, drawn from a consideration of the indirect influence of such legislation upon the institution of slavery in the States, which seems to constitute the burden of the objection, I have been reminded of the view taken of the indirect influence of Congressional anti-slavery legislation by Mr. Madison, in the debates in the first Congress, to which I wish to call the particular attention of the House.

Congress, it will be recollected, was prohibited by the Constitution from abolishing the slave trade prior to the year 1808. In the debate upon a petition of Dr. Franklin and others—to which I shall by and by more particularly refer—praying that Congress would "step to the very verge of the power vested" in it for discouraging the traffic in slaves, the same objection was urged against the action of Congress which is now urged.

On that occasion, Mr Jackson of Georgia, said:

"I apprehend if, through the interference of the General Government, the slave trade was abolished, it would evince to the people a disposition towards a total emancipation, and they would hold their property in jeopardy. I hope the House will order the petition to be laid on the table, in order to prevent a larming our Southern brethren."

And what said Mr. Madison to this?

"He admitted (says the report of that debate) that Congress is restricted by the Constitution from taking measures to abolish the slave trade. Yet there are (said he) a variety of ways by which it could countenance the abolition; and regulations might be made in relation to the introduction of them into the new States to be formed out of the Western Territory. He thought the subject well worthy of consideration."

Thus, though Congress could no more then abolish the slave trade than it can now abolish slavery in the States, yet, in Mr. Madison's opinion, it might very properly so exercise its admitted powers of regulating the introduction of slaves into the new States, as to "countenance" the abolition of the trade. Georgia and South Carolina were then as jealous of the action of Congress upon the subject of slavery, lest it should countenance the abolition of the slave trade, and place "their property in jeopardy, as they now are lest the action of Congress in abolishing slavery and the slave trade in this District should countenance the like abolition in the States. But Mr. Madison was not to be deterred by this from going, in the language of Dr. Franklin's petition, to the "very verge of the power vested in Congress" over the subject of slavery. The modern notions of expediency in regard to this matter seem not to have entered his mind. Then, indeed, slavery did not stand so much higher than any other interest in the country, as to reverse all the ordinary principles of legislation for the purposes of its security and protection. On the contrary, it was considered right to exercise the power of Congress over the subject of slavery in the Territories, "with a view" to "countenancing" what Congress could not then directly accomplish—the abolition of the slavery and the slave trade. If Mr. Madison were now in this hall, and should advance such a doctrine in regard to the abolition of slave trade here, he would be denounced as a disturber of the peace, a "desperate fanatic," and an enemy of the Union. What "a change has come o'er the spirit of" this nation since the Congress of eighty-nine!

While considering the subject of Congressional action in cases in which it may indirectly exert an unfavorable influence upon slavery, the abolition, by Congress, of slavery in the Northwestern Territory, to which I have already adverted, cannot escape attention. The ordinance of 1787 decreeing that abolition, was expressly ratified by the first Congress under the present Constitution. But who can read that ordinance, and especially the preamble to the "six articles" embodied in it, to which I shall hereafter more particularly refer, without perceiving the immense anti-slavery influence it was calculated to exert? But the truth was, the country was not then afraid of that influence; for it was, as I shall presently show, in full accordance with the strong anti-slavery feeling of those times.

In attempting to maintain the right of the North to exert, by all constitutional means, and to the full extent of constitutional authority, an anti-slavery influence on the South, I have drawn an argument from the Union itself, and the fraternal relation which that Union created. But, sir, while I thus reasen from the Union and its fraternal relations, in favor of the right of acting on Southern sentiment, in regard to slavery, I desire to declare most emphatically the deep sense I entertain of the peculiar obligation which this relation imposes upon the North to act in this matter in the spirit of fraternal kindness and good will. This obligation would exist without the Union, for it is universal; much more does it exist with the Union. We do not address ourselves to strangers and foreigners, but to our fellow-citizens; our brethren, to whom we are bound by a thousand endearing ties and patriotic recollections. If we claim to address them on the ground that we are their brethren, then are we solemnly bound to do it in the spirit of brotherly kindness and charity. In that spirit, if I know myself, I now speak; in that spirit I have ever spoken; and in that spirit I desire to assure the South I shall always speak, here and elsewhere, on this subject.

IMPLIED PLEDGE OF THE SOUTH TO THE NORTH.

I have thus endeavored to show that Congress has power to abolish slavery and the slave trade in this District, and to meet the objections to the exercise of that power, drawn from a supposed implied pledge to Virginia and Maryland in accepting the the cessions, and an implied pledge to the whole South, in the act of coming into the Union.

Thus far, however, I have occupied a defensive position, endeavoring, as well as I was able, to vindicate, from the charge of violating pledges and disregarding compromises, those who have asked Congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade here; and who have exercised what they believe to be their just freedom of speech and of the press, for the purpose of convincing the Southern States of the duty of abolishing slavery within their limits.

But, sir, I am not disposed to act merely on the defensive. I intend to show that, while the South charges the North with a violation of implied pledges in regard to slavery, she has herself violated her own clearly implied pledges on this very subject.

Whoever will look into the history of the period when the Constitutuion was formed, will find that it was then the universal expectation—an expectation excited by the slave States themselves, especially by Virginia and Maryland—that slavery would, at no distant day, be abolished by their own legislation. Abolition, as I have already, intimated and will now show, was emphatically the spirit of those times. Slavery was regarded as a doomed institution—as destined to be "of few days," and declared to be "full of evil." It was considered and treated as a dangerous intruder, that was to be allowed, from necesity, to hold, temporarily, as a tenant at sufferance, but by no means to be permitted to enjoy a fee simple in this soil of freedom. This feeling pervaded the country; it pervaded the Convention that formed the Constitution, and must necessarily have formed an essential element in the compromises which led to its adoption.

Anti-slavery was the prevalent feeling of the Revolution. With its first breath this nation drew in an abhorrence of slavery in every form. The colonial policy of the mother country, by which it had been introduced, was the subject of almost universal execration. It was then held to be "self evident" that all men were "created equal, and endowed by their Creator with the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." This great truth—not slavery—was regarded as "the corner-stone of our Republican edifice."

Nor was it held to be exclusively applicable to the Anglo-Saxon race; but the descendants of Africa were to enjoy its benefits and blessings. Accordingly we find the work of African emancipation early commencing under its influence. Vermont took the lead by declaring in her Constitution in 1777 that there should be no slavery within her limits. Massachusetts and Pennsylvania followed in 1780, and New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Rhode Island in 1784. The motives and spirit of these great movements are well set forth in the preamble to the Abolition act of Pennsylvania; a part of which I beg permission to read.

Having recounted the dangers and deliverances of the Revolution, and expressed "a grateful sense of the manifold blessings undeservedly received from the hand of that Being from whom cometh every good and perfect gift," the preamble says:

"Impressed with these ideas, we conceive that it is our duty, and we rejoice that it is in our power, to extend a portion of that freedom to others which has been extended to us. * * * We esteem it a peculiar blessing that we are this day enabled to add one more step to universal civilization by removing as much as possible the sorrows of those who have lived in undeserved bondage. Weaned by a long course of experience from those narrow prejudices we had imbibed, we find our hearts enlarged with kindness and benevolence towards men of all conditions and nations; and we conceive ourselves, at this particular period, extraordinarily called upon, by the blessings we have received, to manifest the sincerity of our professions, and to give a substantial proof of our gratitude."

"And whereas the condition of those persons who have been heretofore denominated negro and mulatto slaves, has been attended with circumstances which not only deprived them of the common blessings they were, by nature, entitled to, but has cast them into the deepest afflictions by an unnatural separation and sale of husband and wife from each other, and their children—an injury, the greatness of which can only be conceived by supposing that we were in the same unhappy case. In justice, therefore, to persons so unhappily circumstanced, and who, having no prospect before them wherein they may rest their sorrows and their hopes, have no reasonable inducement to render the service to society which they otherwise might; and, also, in grateful commemoration of our own happy deliverance from that state of unconditional submission to which we were doomed by the tyranny of Britain: Be it enacted, that no child hereafter born shall be a slave, &c."

Here, Mr. Speaker, is exhibited the spirit of those times. Let this precious preamble be borne in mind as we proceed.

In accordance with the spirit which dictated the emancipations of Pennsylvania and other States, was the ordnance of 1787, to which I have referred. Let me call your attention to the preamble to the six articles in that ordinance, the last of which abolished slavery in the Northwestern Territory. It declares, among other things, that, "for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these Republics, their laws and constitutions are erected, to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions, and governments, which forever hereafter shall be formed in the said Territory. * * * It is hereby ordained," &c.

Such was the preamble to that act abolishing slavery. Then Abolition was regarded as extending "the fundamental principles" which lay at the basis of our Republican institutions. Now, slavery is held to be "the corner-stone" of our Republican edifice!"

Still further to exhibit the spirit of those times, let me refer to the declarations of some of the leading statesmen of that day.

In 1773, Patrick Henry, in a letter to Robert Pleasants, afterwards President of the Virginia Abolition Society, said:

"Is it not amazing that, at a time when rights of humanity are defined and understood with precision, in a country above all others fond of liberty, we find men professing a religion the most humane, mild, gentle, and generous, adopting a principle as repugnant to humanity as it is inconsistent with the Bible, and destructive to liberty? Every thinking, honest man, rejects it in speculation; how few in practice, from conscientious motives! * * * I believe a time will come when an opportunity will be offered to abolish this lamentable evil. Every thing we can do is to improve it, if it happen in our day; if not, let us transmit to our descendants, together with our slaves, a pity for their unhappy lot, and our abhorrence of slavery. * * * Believe me, I shall honor the Quakers for their noble efforts to abolish slavery. It is a debt we owe to the purity of our religion to show that it is at variance with that law that warrants slavery. I exhort you to persevere in so worthy a resolution."

In 1776, Dr. Hopkins, then at the head of the New England divines, in "an address to the owners of negro slaves in the American Colonies," says:

"The conviction of the unjustifiableness of this practice (slavery) has been increasing and greatly spreading of late; and many who have had slaves have found themselves so unable to justify their own conduct in holding them in bondage, as to be induced to set them at liberty. * * * Slavery is, in every instance, wrong, unrighteous, and oppressive—a very great and crying sin—there being nothing of the kind equal to it on the face of the earth."

Near the close of the Revolutionary war, Mr. Jefferson, in his Notes on Virginia, said:

"I think a change already perceptible since the origin of the present revolution. The spirit of the master is abating, that of the slave is rising from the dust, his condition mollifying, and the way, I hope, preparing, under the auspices of Heaven, for a total emancipation."

In 1780, John Jay, in a letter from Spain, wrote:

"The State of New York is rarely out of my mind or heart; and I am often disposed to write much respecting its affairs. But I have so little information as to its present political objects and operations, that I am afraid to attempt it. An excellent law might be made out of the Pennsylvania one for the gradual abolition of slavery. Till America comes into this measure, her prayers to Heaven will be impious. This is a strong expression, but it is just. Were I in your Legislature, I would present a bill, drawn for the purpose with great care; and I would never cease moving it till it became a law, or I ceased to be a member. I believe God governs the world; and I believe it to be a maxim in his, as in our court, that those who ask for equity ought to do it."

Drawing nearer to the time when the Constitution was adopted, and the "compromises" made which "guarantied" the perpetuity of slavery! we come to the celebrated letter of Mr. Jefferson to Dr. Price, of London, dated at Paris, August 7, 1785. Dr. Price had written a pamphlet on the subject of slavery, and Mr. Jefferson's letter was in reply to one from the Doctor on the subject of his pamphlet.

Mr. Jefferson begins by speaking of the manner in which he thinks the pamphlet—which, it seems, had been extensively circulated in America—will have been received. "Southward of the Chesapeake," he thinks, "it will find but few readers concurring with it in sentiment." From the mouth to the head of the Chesapeake it would be received more favorably—"the bulk of the people approving it in theory"—slaveholding keeping "the consciences of many uneasy;" while northward of the Chesapeake the opponents of its doctrines would be about as rare as "robbers and murderers." He then proceeds to say:

"In Maryland I do not find such a disposition to begin the redress of this enormity as in Virginia. This is the next State to which we may turn our eyes for the interesting spectacle of justice in conflict with avarice and oppression; a conflict, wherein the sacred side is gaining daily recruits from the influx into office of young men grown and growing up. These have sucked in the principles of liberty as it were with their mother's milk, and it is to them I look with anxiety to turn the fate of this question. Be not, therefore, discouraged. What you have written will do a great deal of good; and, could you still trouble yourself with our welfare, no man is more able to give aid to the laboring side." [Mr. Jefferson was not afraid of foreign interference. He looked into the question of slavery as belonging to no country exclusively, but affecting the common humanity.] "The College of William and Mary, in Williamsburg, since the remodelling of its plan, is the place where are collected together all the young men of Virginia under preparation for public life. They are there under the direction, most of them, of a Mr. Wythe, one of the most virtuous of characters, and whose sentiments on the subject of slavery are unequivocal. I am satisfied, if you could resolve to address an exhortation to those young men with all the eloquence of which you are master, that its influence on the future decision of this important question would be great, perhaps decisive." [What a request! A Virginian asking an Abolitionist to address a letter on the subject of slavery to the young men of that State, preparing for public life! And they, too, members of a college! Now the subject must not be agitated in colleges, even in New England, and Dr. Price's pamphlets and letters to the young men of Virginia would be seized in the post offices and burnt.]

"Thus you see," continues Mr. Jefferson, "that, so far from thinking you have cause to repent of what you have done, I wish you to do more, and wish it on the assurance of its effect. The information I have received from America of the reception of your pamphlet in the different States agrees with the expectation I had formed. THOS. JEFFERSON."

Proceeding in the order of time, I come to the declarations of Washington. In writing to Robert Morris on the 12th of April, 1786, General Washington said:

"There is not a man living who wishes more sincerely than I do, to see a plan adopted for the abolition of slavery; but there is only one proper and effectual mode by which it can be accomplished, and that is, by legislative authority, and this, as far as my suffrage will go, shall never be wanting."

On the 10th of May, 1786, he thus wrote to Lafayette:

"It (abolition) certainly might and ought to be effected, and that, too, by legislative authority."

In a letter to John Fenton Mercer, of September 9, 1786, he said:

"It is among my first wishes to see some plan adopted by which slavery in this country may be abolished by law."

To John Sinclair he wrote:

"There are in Pennsylvania laws for the gradual abolition of slavery which neither Maryland nor Virginia have at present, but which nothing is more certain than that they must have, and at a period not remote."

These strong expressions of sentiment by General Washington, it should be observed, were uttered only a year before the session of the Convention, himself at its head, which formed the Constitution that "guaranties" the perpetuity of slavery! But let us come a little nearer to the adoption of the Constitution.

In an address by the Hon James Campbell, before the Pennsylvania Society of Cincinnati, on the Fourth of July, 1787, he said:

"Our separation from Great Britain has extended the empire of humanity. The time is not far distant when our sister States, in imitation of our example, shall turn their vassals into freemen."

The Convention that formed the Constitution—whose "compromises" have imposed perpetual silence on the subject of slavery!—was then in session at Philadelphia, and attended on the delivery of this address, with General Washington at their head.

The Convention agreed to the Constitution, and submitted it to the people of the States on the 17th of September, 1787. For further evidence of the public sentiment at that time, let me now refer to the debates in some of the State Conventions to which it was submitted for ratification.

In the debates in the North Carolina Convention, Mr. Iredell, afterwards a Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, said:

"When the entire abolition of slavery takes place, it will be an event which must be pleasing to every generous mind, and every friend of human nature."

Mr. Galloway said:

"I wish to see this abominable trade put an end to. I apprehend the clause (touching the slave trade) means to bring forward manumission."

Luther Martin, of Maryland, a member of the Convention that formed the Constitution of the United States, said:

"We ought to authorize the General Government to make such regulations as shall be thought most advantageous for the gradual abolition of slavery and the emancipation of the slaves which are already in the States."

Judge Wilson, of Pennsylvania, one of the Convention that framed the Constitution, said, in the Pennsylvania Convention that ratified it:

"I consider this clause (that relating to the slave trade) as laying the foundation for banishing slavery out of this country. It will produce the same kind of gradual change which was produced in Pennsylvania. The new States which are to be formed will be under the control of Congress in this particular, and slaves will never be introduced among them. It presents us with the pleasing prospect that the rights of mankind will be acknowledged and established throughout the Union."

In the Virginia Convention of 1787, Mr. Mason, author of the Virginia Constitution, said:

"The augmentation of slaves weakens the States; and such a trade is diabolical in itself, and disgraceful to mankind. * * * As much as I value the Union of all the States, I would not admit the Southern States (South Carolina and Georgia) into the Union, unless they agree to the discontinuance of this disgraceful trade, because it would bring weakness and not strength to the Union."

Mr. Johnson said:

"The principle (of emancipation) has begun since the Revolution. Let us do what we will, it will come round. Slavery has been the foundation of that impiety and dissipation which have been so much disseminated among our countrymen. If it were totally annihilated, it would do much good."

Patrick Henry contended that, by the Constitution, Congress would have power to abolish slavery as indispensably necessary to the safety of the country, whose "general defence" was committed to its care. In addition to this argument, he said:

"Another thing will contribute to bring this event about—slavery is detested. We feel its fatal effects. We deplore it with the pity of humanity."

In the Massachusetts Convention of 1788, General Heath said that—

"Slavery was confined to the States now existing. It could not be extended. By their ordinance, Congress had declared that the new States should be Republican States, and have no slavery."

Judge Dawes said:

"Although slavery is not smitten by an apoplexy, yet it has received a mortal wound, and will die of consumption."

Such are some of the expressions of opinion in the Conventions that adopted the Constitution, in regard to slavery, and its probable speedy abolition. The expressions in regard to the latter may be all summed up in the brief and significant language of Judge Dawes—slavery "has received a mortal wound, and will die of consumption." This, indeed, was the public opinion of that day; and yet we are now told that the Constitution, which drew its first breath in the atmosphere of that public opinion, contained an implied guarantee, or had connected with it such compromises as implied a guarantee, for the security of slavery, even at the expense of a sacrifice of the rights of speech, and the press, and petition! Every body understood that slavery was mortally wounded, and destined to speedy death; and yet, by a strange necromancy of constitutional implication, there was at that very time thrown around it the shield of the Union for protection against its great enemies—freedom of speech and freedom of the press!

Let me now refer to a few expressions of opinion going to show the state of public sentiment soon after the adoption of the Constitution.

In the Maryland House of Delegates in 1789, William Pinkney said:

"But, sir, is it possible that this body should not feel for the reputation of Maryland? Is national honor unworthy of consideration? Is the censure of an enlightened universe insufficient to alarm us? The character of my country among the nations of the world is as dear to me as that country itself." [Noble sentiment! But in what Maryland bosom does it now beat, in reference to slavery and the slave trade here, for which this nation is responsible to "an enlightened universe?"] "What a motley appearance (continues Mr P.) must Maryland at this moment make in the eyes of those who view her with deliberation. Is she not at once the fair temple of freedom and the abominable nursery of slaves? the school for patriots and the foster-mother of petty despots? the asserter of human rights and the patron of wanton oppression? Here have emigrants from a land of tyranny found an asylum from persecution; and here also have those who came as rightfully free as the winds of heaven found an eternal grave for the liberties of themselves and their posterity. * * * * * Sir, by the eternal principles of natural justice, no master in the State has a right to hold his slave in bondage for a single hour. * * * To me, sir, nothing for which I have not the evidence of my senses is more clear than that it [slavery] will one day destroy that reverence for liberty which is the vital principle of a Republic." [Now slavery has become essential to the preservation of our liberties—the "corner stone of our Republican edifice!"] "Sir, the thing is impolitic; never will your country be productive; never will its agriculture, its commerce, or its manufactures flourish, so long as they depend on reluctant bondmen for their progress."

What must have been the state of public sentiment which could in the Legislature of a slave State bear such an indignant, burning rebuke of slavery as this? Did Pinkney, or the body whom he addressed, believe that there was in or about the Constitution of the United States any "implied" prohibition of the freedom of speech on the subject of slavery?

Let me now turn, for further evidence of public sentiment, to the debates in the first Congress. On the 12th of February, 1790, a memorial was presented, signed by Benjamin Franklin, President of the Pennsylvania Abolition Society, setting forth in strong language the injustice of slavery, its inconsistency with our institutions, and the duty of all to labor to effect its abolition; and asking Congress to take into consideration the traffic in slaves, and "step to the very verge of the power vested" in it for "discouraging every species of traffic in the persons of our fellow men."

The reception of this petition was neither objected to nor "considered" as objected to; but it was respectfully received and considered. In the debate that arose upon it, Mr. Parker, of Virginia, said:

"I cannot help expressing the pleasure I feel in finding so considerable a part of the community attending to matters of such momentous concern to the future prosperity and happiness of the people of America. I think it my duty as a citizen of the Union to espouse their cause."

Mr. Page, of Virginia, (afterwards Governor,) said:

"He was in favor of the commitment. He hoped that the designs of the respectable memorialists would not be stopped at the threshold, in order to preclude a fair discussion of the prayer of the memorial. He placed himself in the case of a slave." [This is the true position—to make the slave's case our own—to "remember those in bonds as bound with them." When we do this, we shall go where Franklin asked the first Congress to go—to "the very verge" of our power, to abolish, and, where we cannot abolish, to "discourage" slavery. But to proceed with the quotation.] "He placed himself in the case of a slave, and said that, on hearing that Congress had refused to listen to the decent suggestions of the respectable part of the community," [now the petitioners are "despicable fanatics!"] "he should infer that the General Government, from which it was expected great good would result to every class of citizens, had shut their ears against the voice of humanity."

Mr. Scott, of Pennsylvania, said:

"I cannot, for my part, conceive how any person can be said to acquire a property in another. I do not know how far I might go, if I was one of the judges of the United States, and those people were to come before me, and claim their emancipation; but I am sure I would go as far as I could."

Mr. Burke, of South Carolina, said:

"He saw the disposition of the House, and he feared it would be referred to a committee, maugre all their opposition."

Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, said:

"That, on entering into this Government, they (South Carolina and Georgia) apprehended that the other States * * * would, from motives of humanity and benevolence, be led to vote for a general emancipation."

In a debate at a previous session of Congress, (May 13, 1789,) on a proposition to impose a duty of ten dollars each on imported slaves—

Mr. Parker, of Virginia, the mover of the proposition, said:

"He hoped Congress would do all that lay in their power to restore to human nature its inherent privileges, and, if possible, wipe off the stigma under which America labored. The inconsistency in our principles, with which we are justly charged, should be done away, that we may show by our actions the pure beneficence of the doctrine we hold out to the world in our Declaration of Independence."

Mr. Jackson, of Georgia, said:

"It was the fashion of the day to favor the liberty of the slaves."

Mr. Madison said:

"The dictates of humanity, the principles of the people, the national safety and happiness, and prudent policy, require it of us. * * * * I conceive the Constitution, in this particular, was formed in order that the Government, whilst it was restrained from laying a total prohibition, might be able to give some testimony of the sense of America with respect to the African trade. * * It is to be hoped that, by expressing a national disapprobation of this trade, we may destroy it, and save ourselves from reproaches, and our posterity the imbecility ever attendant on a country filled with slaves. * * If there is any one point in which it is clearly the policy of this nation, so as we constitutionally can, to vary the practice obtaining under some of the State Governments, it is this."

Such was the strong anti-slavery feeling manifested in the first Congress. And it is worthy of remark that the question of slavery was treated as a national question—arguments for national interference, to the full extent of constitutional power, and with a view to "varying the practice under some of the State Governments," being drawn from considerations of national honor, national strength, and national safety.

Pursuing the order of time, let me give two additional and pointed reprobations of slavery by distinguished men of that period:

In 1794, Dr. Rush declared:

"Domestic slavery is repugnant to the principles of Christianity. It prostrates every benevolent and just principle of action in the human heart. It is rebellion against the authority of a common Father. It is a practical denial of the extent and efficacy of the death of a common Saviour. It is a usurpation of the prerogative of the great Sovereign of the universe, who has solemnly claimed an exclusive property in the souls of men."

In 1796, Mr. Tucker of Virginia, Judge of the Supreme Court of that State, and professor of law in the College of William and Mary, in a letter to the General Assembly of that State, urging the abolition of slavery, said:

"Should we not, at the time of the Revolution, have broken their fetters? Is it not our duty to embrace the first moment of constitutional health and vigor to effectuate so desirable an object, and to remove from us a stigma with which our enemies will never fail to upbraid us, nor our consciences to reproach us?

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to another, and, in some respects, much stronger evidence of the prevalence of anti-slavery sentiments at the period to which I have referred. I do not allude to expressions of individual opinion, but to associated opinion and associated effort in favor of the abolition of slavery. Yes, sir, so strongly was the public mind moved on the subject of "Abolition," that Abolition societies were actually formed in Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland and Virginia. The Pennsylvania Society was formed in 1780, and incorporated by act of the Legislature in 1787—Benjamin Franklin, President; Dr. Rush, Secretary. The New York Society was formed in 1785—John Jay, President, afterwards Alexander Hamilton. The Maryland Society was formed in 1789. Among its officers were Judge Chase and Luther Martin. In 1790 the Connecticut Society was formed —Dr. Stiles, President, and Simeon Baldwin, (late Judge Baldwin,) Secretary. In the same year the Virginia Society was formed—Robert Pleasants, President; and also the New Jersey Society, which had an acting committee of five members in each county in the State. In reference to these societies, I find in the "Anti-Slavery Examiner," which I hold in my hand, the following:

"Among the distinguishen individnals who were efficient officient officers of these Abolition Societies, and delegates from their respective State Societies at the annual meeting of the American Convention for promoting the abolition of slavery, were Hon. Uriah Tracy, United States Senator from Connecticut; Hon Zephania Swift, Chief Justice of the same State; Hon. Cæsar A. Rodney, Attorney General of the United States; Hon. James A. Bayard, United States Senator from Delaware; Governor Bloomfield, of New Jersey; Hon. Wm. Rawle, the late venerable head of the Philadelphia Bar; Messrs. Foster and Tillinghast, of Rhode Island; Messrs. Ridgely, Buchanan, and Wilkinson of Maryland; and Messrs. Pleasants, McLean, and Anthony, of Virginia."

For the purpose of showing the principles and objects of these societies, let me refer briefly to the constitutions of two of them, and the memorials to Congress of two others.

The following is the preamble to the Constitution of the Pennsylvania society:

"It having pleased the Creator of the world to make of one flesh all the children of men, it becomes them to consult and promote to each other's happiness as members of the same family, however diversified they may be by color, situation, religion, or different states of society. It is more especially the duty of those persons who profess to maintain for themselves the rights of human nature, and who acknowledge the obligations of Christianity, to use such means as are in their power to extend the blessings of freedom to every part of the human race, and in a more particular manner to such of their fellow-creatures as are entitled to freedom by the laws and constitutions of any of the United States, and who, notwithstanding, are detained in bondage by fraud or violence. From a full conviction of the truth and obligation of these principles—from a desire to diffuse them wherever the miseries and vices of slavery exist, and in humble confidence of the favor and support of the Father of mankind, the subscribers have associated themselves under the title of the "Pennsylvania Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery and the Relief of Free Negroes unlawfully held in Bondage."

The following is part of the preamble to the Constitution of the New Jersey Society:

"It is our boast that we live under the Government, wherein life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, are recognised as the universal rights of men. We abhor that inconsistent, illiberal, and interested policy which withholds those rights from an unfortunate and degraded class of our fellow-creatures."

The Connecticut and Virginia Societies sent memorials to Congress. The following is an extract from the former:

"From the sober conviction of the unrighteousness of slavery, your petitioners have long beheld with grief our fellow-men doomed to perpetual bondage in a country which boasts of her freedom. Your petitioners were led by motives, we conceive, of general philanthropy [now it is "fanaticism"] to associate ourselves together for the protection and assistance of this unfortunate part of our fellow-men."

The memorial of the Virginia Society is headed, "The memorial of the Virginia Society for promoting the abolition of slavery." The following is an extract:

"Your memorialists fully believing that slavery is not only an odious degradation, but an outrageous violation of one of the most essential rights of human nature, and utterly repugnant to the precepts of the Gospel," &c.

It would seem to be an appropriate closing of this mass of testimony to read, as I will now beg permission to do, an extract from a sermon of President Edwards, the younger, preached before the Connecticut Abolition Society, September 15, 1791.

"Thirty years ago (said he) scarcely a man in this country thought either the slave trade or the slavery of negroes to be wrong; but now, how many and able advocates in private life, in our Legislatures, and in Congress, have appeared, and openly and irrefragably pleaded the rights of humanity, in this as well as other instances? And if we judge of the future by the past, within fifty years from this time [the fifty years are about expiring!] it will be as shameful for a man to hold a negro slave as to be guilty of common robbery or theft."

Upon the testimony thus presented, I cannot, Mr. Speaker, find time for an extended commentary. Nor do I deem it necessary. It seems to me impossible that it should have failed to convince all who have heard it, that, so far from there having been an implied pledge on the part of the free States, that the subject of slavery should not be agitated, there arose necessarily, from the common sentiment of that period in regard to slavery, from the perfect freedom with which it was every where assailed, and from the general expectation of its speedy abolition, an implied pledge on the part of the slave States that no obstacles should be interposed to the freest action of public sentiment in regard to it; but that they would, in fact, continue to co-operate, as they were then co-operating, with the philanthropists of the North, in producing a public sentiment that should, "at no distant day," put an end to the evil.

VIOLATION OF IMPLIED PLEDGE OF THE SOUTH TO THE NORTH.

And now, Mr. Speaker, let me look a little at the manner in which the pledge of the South to the North has been redeemed; or rather, I ought to say, at the extent of its violation. If you will accompany me in a brief examination, I will show you how slavery has increased its numbers—acquired new territory —enlarged in power—claimed exemption from all opposition—and trampled down the dearest rights of freedom, in its march to uncontrolled dominion.

In 1790 the slave population amounted to - -	697,867
Now mark its increase:
In 1800 it was - - - - - -	893,041
In 1810 it was - - - - - -	1,191,364
In 1820 it was - - - - - -	1,538 964
In 1830 it was - - - - - -	2,009,031
In 1840 probable number, - - - -	2,700 000

Slavery was to be abolished "at no distant day!" and yet it has increased to two million seven hundred thousand! And in that very State from which Washington, Jefferson, Madison Henry, and others predicted, and prayed for its speedy extirpation, are slaves now actually raised for exportation.

Mr. GARLAND of Virginia here interposed, and denied the truth of the assertion. Mr. S. perceiving that the remark had excited some sensibility, and desiring to avoid seeming to cast reproach upon Virginia, passed it over by remarking that the District of Columbia was notoriously a market for the surplus slaves in the neighboring counties of Virginia and Maryland, and that slaves thus purchased were annually shipped in large numbers to Southern markets. On the day following, Mr. GARLAND, in his reply to Mr. S. having spoken to his allusion to slave-breeding in Virginia as "the repetition of a base slander of that prince of demagogues, Daniel O'Connell," Mr. S. asked permission to read, in proof of his assertion, the following account of the declarations of distinguished Virginians which he found in "Jay's View of the action of the Federal Government in behalf of Slavery."

In the Legislature of this State, in 1832, Thomas Jefferson Randolph declared that Virginia had been converted into 'one grand menagerie, where men are reared for the market like oxen for the shamble.' This same gentleman thus compared the foreign with the domestic traffic:' The trader (African) receives the slaves, a stranger in aspect, language, and manner, from the merchant who brought him from the interior. But here, sir, individuals whom the master has known from infancy—whom he has seen sporting in the innocent gambols of childhood—who have been accustomed to look to him for protection, he tears from the mother's arms, and sells into a strange country—among a strange people—subject to cruel taskmasters. In my opinion, it is much worse.'

"Mr. Gholson of Virginia, in his speech in the Legislature of that State, January 18, 1831, (see Richmond Whig,) says: 'The legal maxim of partus sequitur ventrem is coeval with the existence of the rights of property itself, and is founded in wisdom and justice. It is only on the justice and inviolability of this maxim that the master foregoes the service of the female slave, has her nursed and attended during the period of her gestation, and raises the helpless and infant offspring. The value of the property justifies the expense; and I do not hesitate to say that in its increase consists much of our wealth."

"Professor Dew, now president of the College of William and Mary, Virginia, in his review of the debate in the Virginia Legislature in 1831, '32, speaking of the revenue arising from the trade, says: 'A full equivalent being thus left in the place of the slave, this emigration becomes an advantage to the State, and does not check the black population as much as at first view we might imagine, because it furnishes every inducement to the master to attend to the negroes, to encourage breeding, and to cause the greatest number possible to be raised. Virginia is, in fact, a negro raising State for other States.'

"Mr. C. F. MERCER asserted in the Virginia Convention of 1829: 'The tables of the natural growth of the slave population demonstrate, when compared with the increase of its numbers in the Commonwealth for twenty years past, that an annual revenue of not less than a million and a half of dollars is derived from the exportation of a part of this population.' "

Mr. SLADE proceeded. With the increase of slaves from 697,897 to near two millions and three quarters, have the number of the slave States increased from six to thirteen, three of the new slave States being formed from territory purchased with the common treasure of the nation; so that the North has actually paid her money to purchase new fields to be moistened with the sweat and blood of slavery, instead of having the promised aid of the South, in getting rid of the national evil!

The number of representatives, on account of the slave population, has increased to twenty-five, and will probably rise to thirty, after the next census. Let me show you, Mr. Speaker, the strange results of this principle of "slave representation" on this floor.

The slave States, with a free population of 3,823,000, have one hundred representatives; while the free States, with a population of 7,003,000, have but one hundred and forty-two. Look at this in some of its details.

Virginia, with a population of 741,000, has twenty-one representatives, while Ohio, with a population of 947,000, has but nineteen. The free State, with a free population of 206,000 more, has a representation of two less.

Pennsylvania, with a population of 1,347,300, has twenty-eight representatives, while South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, with a population of 912,000, being 435,800 less than Pennsylvania, has the same number. I might pursue this comparison; but I have gone far enough to show the great disadvantage to which the free States have been subjected by yielding to the South a slave representation, for which they obtained in the compromise no substantial equivalent, as I will now show.

The Constitution provides that "representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons * * * three-fifths of all other persons," that is, three-fifths of the slaves. This extra burden of taxation on account of slaves was regarded as some compensation to the North for the extra advantage to the South of a slave representation. Now, sir, let us see how this consideration for the concession has failed.

By a letter of the 26th of January, 1838, in reply to a call for information from the Register of the Treasury, it appears that the whole of the receipts into the Treasury of the United States, from the 4th of March 1789, to the 31st of December, 1836, had been:

From Customs,	$682,957,784 47
Internal revenue,	22,253,045 38
Postage,	1,092,227 52
Direct taxes,	12,742,294 64
	$719,045,352 01
The receipts for the last three years have been - - - -	96,731,262 48
	$815,776.614 49

It thus appears that of more than eight hundred and fifteen millions of receipts, about twelve millions and three-quarters only have been from direct taxation, and, even of this, the North has, of course, paid her proportion. Such is the practical equivalent which has been received for a concession which has enabled the South, by a representation of slave property, to control the destinies of the country for fifty years—a concession which no one now believes would have been made, but for the assurance which I have shown was felt, an assurance encouraged by the slave States themselves, that slavery should, "at no distant day," be abolished throughout the country.

But while the rendering of the constitutional equivalent for the slave representation has thus been avoided when money was to be paid, we find the compromise fully carried out when money is to be received. Thus the ratio of representation, including the representation in the Senate, was made the basis of the distribution of the surplus revenue by the act of 1836, giving, of course, a disproportionate amount to the slave States. Thus the thirteen free States, with a population of 7,003,000, received $21,410,77/ 12; while the thirteen slave States, with a free population of 3,823,000, received $16,058,082 85! So that there was received for each free inhabitant of the slave States $4 20; while for each inhabitant of the free States there was received but $3 06!

While considering the subject of the concession to the South of a slave representation, one cannot help inquiring what—since so much is said of implied compromises—were the real compromises of the Constitution, in connection with the subject of slavery? What did each party actually concede to the other?

There was conceded to the South the stipulation to deliver up fugitive slaves—protection against domestic violence—a continuance of the slave trade twenty years—and the three-fifths representation of slave property. Surely these are large concessions to be made in favor of slavery. And what concession was made to the North in return? None, except the stipulation just referred to, in regard to direct taxation, which has, as I have shown, amounted to nothing.

Does not this glaring inequality of concession give irresistible force to the argument which I have drawn from the history of those times, to show that it was the general expectation that slavery would be soon abolished? Is it possible to believe that such concessions would have been made in favor of slavery, (concessions to wrong, not to right,) if any body had suspected that it was not to be abolished, but to be cherished, increased, and made permanent? Did any body dream that the concession of a "three-fifths" representation would, within fifty years, bring into Congress thirty representatives—a representation of two millions seven hundred thousand slaves? But, more than all—could it have been thought of, or, if thought of, could the idea have been endured for a moment—that that concession was to be used as an engine of political power? that the destinies of the country were actually to be controlled by the representation which slavery should bring into this hall, and the votes it should give in the elections of the Chief Magistrates of the country?

Mr. Speaker, the history of slavery in this country for the last thirty years, has been a history of encroachment without a parallel—encroachment involving as gross a violation of implied pledges as can well be conceived. Let facts speak on this subject; and that they may speak in the best manner, and to the best effect, let me read to the House an extract from a speech delivered in the Senate of the United States some two years ago, by Governor Davis of Massachusetts, whose sound, practical sense, for which he is so much and so deservedly distinguished, seized upon the strong points in this matter of Southern encroachment, and presented them in the following language:

"This interest (slavery) has ruled the destinies of the Republic. For forty out of forty-eight years, it has given us a President from its own territory, and of its own selection. During all this time it has not only had a President sustaining its own peculiar views of public policy, but, through him, has held and used in its own way the whole organization of all the Departments, and all the vast and controlling patronage incident to that office, to aid it in carrying on its views and policy, as well as to protect and secure to it every advantage."

"Let us explore a little further, and see how the two Houses of Congress have been organized. For thirty years out of thirty-six that interest has placed its own Speaker in the chair of the other House, thus securing the organization of committees, and the great influence of that station. And, sir, while all other interests have, during part of the time, had the chair (Vice Presidency) in which you preside assigned to them, as an equivalent for these great concessions, yet, in each year, when a President pro tem. is elected, who, upon the contingencies mentioned in the Constitution, will be the President of the United States, that interest has invariably given us that officer. Look, I beseech you, through all the places of honor, of profit, and privilege; and there you will find the representatives of this interest in numbers that indicate its influence. Does not, then, this interest rule, guide, and adapt public policy to its own views, and fit it to suit the action and products of its own labor?"

In connection with the view thus presented by Governor Davis, let me refer to the progress of the influence of slavery in the elections of the presiding officers of this House. The termination of the present Congress will complete fifty two years from the organization of the Government. During the first twelve years the Speakers were from Pennsylvania, Connecticut, New Jersey, and Massachusetts; during the next six years from North Carolina; the next four years from Massachusetts; the next nine years from Kentucky and South Carolina; the next year from New York; the next four years from Virginia and Kentucky; the next two years from New York; and the last fourteen years from Virginia and Tennessee.

Dividing the whole term, as near as may be, into three equal periods, it appears that, for the first seventeen years, the chair was filled twelve years from the North, and five years from the South; for the next seventeen years five from the North, and twelve from the South; and for the last eighteen years two from the North, and sixteen from the South!

Such a result as this needs no comment. It speaks for itself, and speaks a language not to be misunderstood.

For further evidence of the power of slavery and its disposition to encroachment, I might, if I had time, refer to numerous important questions which have been decided in Congress, in which the power of the three-fifths representation has had a controlling effect. I might also speak of the existing relations between the States of Georgia and Maine, and Virginia and New York, growing out of the extraordinary claims of Georgia and Virginia in connection with slavery. I might refer to the frequent threats of violence—to the scenes of Lynching—to the violation of the mails—and to the violation of the Constitution, in denying to the free colored citizens of the North the privileges of citizens in the Southern States of this Union. But time would fail me.

Upon this latter topic, however, I cannot refrain from dwelling, for a moment, for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the effect which has been given, at the South, to the laws prohibiting the emigration within their borders, and even a sojourn among them, of free colored citizens of other States. I allude to the execution of these laws upon the citizens of a foreign country, forced by the dangers of the sea into a Southern port of this Union. I have in my hand the following from a Jamaica paper (the Despatch,) published in the year 1833, which I beg permission to read:

"We have been politely favored with a Haytien paper, L'Union de Port-au Prince, of the 19th ult. by which it would appear that the Republic is highly indignant at the treatment experienced by the crew of a Haytien vessel, which was forced, by stress of weather, to enter one of the United States, (Charleston.) L'Union, after detailing the circumstances that obliged the vessel in question, L'Artibonite to put into Charleston remarks: 'So soon as she arrived there, the whole of the crew (captain allowed to remain) were seized and thrown into prison, where every assistance or comfort was denied to our unfortunate mariners, whose incarceration lasted the whole time that the vessel was being repaired. This is an outrage against the Haytien nation. The day may yet come when it will be in our power to cause the name of Haytiens to be respected abroad, and particularly so by our arrogant neighbors. Until that period arrives, however, we have in our hands the means of retaliation. Already, if we judge rightly, a spirit of deep aversion to the Americans manifests itself, and seems to pervade all classes of our citizens: and so indignant do we feel at their conduct towards our countrymen, that we are almost inclined to denounce and hold them up to the hatred of the nation.' "

Now, Mr. Speaker, what but a want of power on the part of the Haytien Government has prevented a demand upon this Government for redress for this outrage on the rights of Haytien citizens? There is, it is true, no danger of a war with Hayti. Her weakness is our protection! But may not our extensive and profitable commerce with that nation be made to suffer from such outrages on the rights of its citizens? And, shall it be still asked, What has this nation to do with slavery?

There is one fact, placing in a very strong light the tenaciousness of the slave power, and its disregard of the implied pledge to which I have referred, which I cannot omit to notice; and to which I ask the special attention of this House. It is a claim that no free State shall be admitted into this Union without the simultaneous admission of a slave State.* It is even urged as an argument for the division of Florida, and its admission into the Union as two States, that it must be done in order to balance with two new slave States the two new free States —soon to be admitted—of Wiskonsan and Iowa. To give plausibility to this demand of slavery, it is asserted in an article, in a late Virginia paper, (transferred to the Globe) that—

"From the time that new States began to be admitted in addition to the 'Old Thirteen,' from that time it has been the fixed policy of the Union to admit a slave State and a free State at the same time. Thus Kentucky and Vermont came in together. Ohio and Tennessee followed; Alabama and Illinois, Louisiana and Indiana, Missouri and Maine, Arkansas and Michigan. Thus the Union kept its parts even, and to do so, twice have the New England States divided their small States and made them less. Vermont and Maine were both divided from other States to make new ones to balance, in the Senate at least, the new large slaveholding States."

Aware of the startling character of such a claim in favor of slavery, the writer of the article says—"it has been the fixed policy of the Union to admit a slave and a free State at the same time." This I deny. The States mentioned by him as having come into the Union on the "balance" principle, have been admitted as follows:

Slave.		Free.
Kentucky,	1791	Vermont,	1791
Tennessee,	1796	Ohio,	1802
Louisiana,	1812	Indiana,	1816
Alabama,	1819	Illinois,	1818
Missouri,	1821	Maine,	1820
Arkansas,	1836	Michigan,	1836

Now, in the first place, this writer has omitted Mississippi (admitted in 1817) from his account current between the slaveholding and non slaveholding States. The introduction of it throws his balance sheet into confusion, besides showing the advantage which slavery has gained over freedom in the admission of new States.

But, independent of this, the list furnishes no evidence of the "fixed policy" of which he speaks. Thus, sir, all know that the political "balance" between freedom and slavery, now contended for, was entirely unthought of when Kentucky and Vermont came into the Union. The well-known state of public feeling on the subject of slavery at that period shows this conclusively. Indeed, the notion that slavery, which it was then declared had "received a mortal wound, and would die of consumption," was to run a race with freedom, is absolutely ridiculous.

The idea of a division of "small States of New England to make new ones to balance" is equally destitute of foundation. Maine was separated from Massachusetts proper, by the Territory of New Hampshire; and her political separation was, therefore, dictated by her natural position, as well as by other obvious considerations, having no relation to the "balance" now contended for. As for Vermont, the "Green Mountain boys," driven by the injustice of New York, declared themselves independent, and formed a State Constitution in 1777, fourteen years before their admission into the Union; and having maintained their independence against New York, New Hampshire, and Canada, by a combination of the most consummate skill and noble daring, they finally came into the Union in 1791.

I might go through the list and show that the controlling reasons for the admission of all the new States into the Union have had no connection with the idea of the "balance" suggested. I know the admission of Missouri, as a slave State, was urged upon the ground of the admission of Maine as a free one; and if I am not mistaken, the claim now formerly insisted on was then for the first time brought forward. It was, I regret to say, successful; and it has again been successful in the admission of Arkansas as a slave State.

I do not complain that new States at the South have been admitted into the Union—not even that seven have been admitted from the North. But I do complain that they have been admitted as slave States; and especially that there are among them States whose territory formed no part of the "Old Thirteen," and which have, therefore, brought into the Union an addition to the burden and weakness and curse, from which, at the adoption of the Constitution, it was universally expected the country would soon be delivered

But more especially do I complain that it has come to be avowed as a settled principle of national policy that the slave power is to be maintained in its existing relative strength, by the admission of new slave States. How strongly does this contrast with the public sentiment and policy at the time of the formation of the Constitution. Slavery, which was then doomed, by the general judgment of the country, to speedy destruction—the subject of almost universal execration—now raises its brazen front, and claims to be regarded as an essential element of, and to have its relative political power carefully maintained in, this Union of freedom!

But this is not all. Fearing that, in the vast territory West and North of Missouri, the indomitable spirit of Northern enterprise may raise up new States to add to the empire of freedom, and diminish the relative strength of slavery, the South turns its eyes to the wide domain and fruitful soil of Texas, and seeks to add to our country a territory which may be manufactured into half a dozen new States to maintain the balance in favor of slavery! Yes, sir; slavery has actually entered upon a system of colonizing—colonizing by conquest—colonizing from a land of freedom—colonizing to bring under its dominion a country from whose soil, in the advancing power of free principles, it had just been banished!

Thus, as slavery sinks in other countries, it rises in this. As its limits are contracted elsewhere, they are enlarged here. At the moment that its iron sceptre is broken in the British West Indies, are American statesmen devising means to strengthen and enlarge its dominion in the land yet reddened with blood poured out to assert and maintain that "all men are created equal!"

Where is to terminate this progress of the slave power? Where shall its Southward movements cease, until to keep pace with the westward march of freedom to the shores of the Pacific, it shall darken and desolate the fields of Mexico and Gautemala, and find the limit of the same ocean at the Isthmus of Darien?

But, Mr. Speaker, slavery is not content with a multiplication of its victims or an extension of its territorial dominions. It sees the gathering storm, and prepares to avert it. It understands the power of free discussion, and seeks to suppress its outbreakings. For this purpose it penetrates the free States—it surrounds peaceable assemblies with mobs—it destroys printing presses—it kills or follows with persecution their conductors—it even enters the city of PENN, the city where yet stands the "Hall of Independence," and applies the torch to a noble edifice dedicated to free discussion. And, sir, it has finally come into the halls of Congress, and assailed Liberty in these her most sacred temples, by striking down the cherished and solemnly guarantied right of petition, and imposing silence upon the Representatives of freemen here.

But this is not all. Slavery has found its way into the Executive Department of this Government, introducing, and giving efficacy, through that Department, to a new element of power unknown to the Constitution, namely, "the wishes of the slaveholding States;" insomuch that the President, while admitting that Congress has constitutional power to abolish slavery and the slave trade in this District, declares, in advance, that he will give his official sanction to no bill for such abolition, "against the wishes of the slaveholding States." The "wishes," be it observed—not the arguments—of the slaveholding States are to govern the Executive action! With arguments he has nothing to do. He throws from himself all responsibility of judging, and makes the simple fact of the "wishes" of a minority of the people decisive. No other interest has ever advanced such a claim. In all the struggles about a protective tariff, the manufacturing States have set up no such pretensions; and if they had, they would have found no President willing to give such effect to their "wishes." Thus, slavery asks and obtains what would be yielded to no other interests in the country.

But slavery is not content with all this. When the people of the North, in the strength of their feeling for their brethren in slavery, and under a sense of the national responsibility for its continuance, with the abomigations of the slave trade, in this District, send their petitions here for its abolition, Slavery rises up, in the persons of honorable members on this floor, and threatens to dissolve the Union! Yes, sir, slavery, that very slavery that, fifty years ago, was declared to have the consumption, and to be struck with death, has "got well," grown fat and lusty, talks of living forever, and absolutely threatens a dissolution of the Union if he is not "let alone," and permitted to go on unimpeded in his march to complete dominion! Who can find words to express the amazement which this is calculated to excite?

Thus it is, Mr. Speaker, that slavery has, ever since this Union was formed, been gradually augmenting its power; moving on, especially during the latter part of the half century of our national existence, with giant strides in the march of encroachment, constantly grasping power, and constantly asking for more, never saying enough, but always crying, give! give! give!

And now, Mr. Speaker, let me entreat gentlemen to review the subject in the light which I have endeavored to throw upon it, and tell me if it is not the height of injustice to charge the petitioners and the agitators of the subject of slavery at the North, with a violation of implied pledges in favor of slavery, when it is manifest beyond the power of contradiction that the South has violated, and is at this moment flagrantly violating its own most clearly implied pledges of a contrary character.

Sir, as I have already intimated, the North, so far from encroaching on the rights of the South in this matter, are but resisting the encroachments of the slave power. They are standing on the very confines of the Constitution, battling, not merely for the rights of the slave, but for the dearest rights of freemen. And are they to yield at this point? No, sir, no; not a hair's breadth. They cannot, without a surrender of every thing. It is time the South should understand that the North is no longer to stand still and witness the encroachments of slavery with arms folded, eyes closed, and mouths shut; but that, while they will not transcend, by the breadth of a hair, the limits of the Constitution, they owe it to themselves—to their country—to its honor abroad—to its safety at home—to humanity—to justice—and to the world, struggling for victory over time-honored oppression—to stand firm upon the ground of constitutional right, and never surrrender for one moment those great weapons of fair and honest warfare against slavery—freedom of speech—freedom of the press—and freedom of petition.

But I may be told that, though there might have been, at the adoption of the Constitution, no such compromise in favor of slavery as is now contended for, yet there should be such a compromise now; that, since the South are so excitable on the subject, it is not best to agitate it; but to refrain for the sake of preserving the Union. Sir, I am willing to yield much for the sake of peace—which none can prize more highly than I do—and for the Union—whose benefits are by no means to be lightly put at hazard. But I am not willing to yield every thing. There is a point where yielding must stop, or every thing will be demanded and surrendered.

Compromise! What is a compromise but a mutual concession? And what are the South prepared to concede? Nothing! As usual in the contest between freedom and slavery in this country, the concessions must all be on one side. While slavery is reaching forth the arms of her power in every direction —lengthening her cords and strengthening her stakes, and grasping, by a bold and daring policy, the entire control of the Union, the people of the North must stand still—shut their mouths—throw away their pens—break their presses—and sit down in silence, without even the poor privilege of praying for deliverance from her all-grasping dominion! And all in the spirit of compromise! for the sake of peace! and the Union! Sir, it is enough to sicken the soul of a freeman to hear this cant of compromise—a compromise of silence! of death! not the death of slavery but of freedom!

ABOLITION—ITS AIMS—AND THE MEANS OF THEIR ACCOMPLISHMENT.

Mr. Speaker, I have done with "the compromises of the Constitution." I regret that I am compelled to leave this branch of my subject while so much remains to be said to do it justice. But I must forbear.

Recurring to the question more directly before the House, let me remark that there is another reason, substantially, though not very distinctly, urged against the reception of petitions on the subject of slavery. It is, that they come from "abolitionists."

I have been amazed, while sitting here, to witness the strife on this floor, in denouncing the men and women whose prayers come up here for the abolition of slavery. "Pedantic knaves" —"superstitious fanatics"—"vile fanatics"—"desperate and despicable fanatics"—are specimens of this denunciation. Sir, I promised when I began that I would indulge in no retorts; and surely I cannot find it in my heart to indulge any suited to such attacks. Not that I do not hold in high estimation the many excellent and intelligent of my constituents who are thus assailed; but it is because I do thus esteem them, that I make no reply to such denunciations

"Abolitionists!" What is abolition? At what does it aim? By what means is it sought to accomplish its objects? These are questions which I propose briefly to answer.

Abolition is among the noblest of the objects which can engage the efforts of man. It is the deliverance of men from the ownership of others, and restoring them to the ownership of themselves. It is to take away whips and tortures as incentives to effort, and to substitute for them the instincts of self-support, and the nobler and more efficient ones of care for the support of others. It is to substitute for promiscuous concubinage, the marriage relation, with its sacred rights, its hallowed privileges and its countless blessings. It is to emancipate mind from complete human dominion, and raise it to freedom of thought, freedom of purpose, and conscious responsibility to the God of the universe. It is to open the Bible, now shut to millions of human beings, and to give them the privilege, and aid them to enjoy it, of "searching the Scriptures," which are "able to make them wise unto salvation."

This is Abolition. Who ought to be reproached for it? Who ought to be ashamed of it? It may be sneered at and derided; and may come to be used as a name of reproach. But who cares for a name? Who that is capable of understanding what principle means, will tremble at the name of Abolitionist? Here is the thing. Look at it. Is there a nobler end under heaven —can there be—than the emancipation of the body and the soul of one man from such dominion, and his restoration to such rights?

These great purposes Abolitionists aim to accomplish to the extent of their power throughout this country, and throughout the world. Their benevolence is bounded by no lines of latitude or longitude; by no seas, oceans, or continents. It grasps the globe. Wherever there is a human being suffering from oppression, there does it find an object of kind regard and anxious solicitude. It feels for those in bonds "as bound with them." The fetters which gall the limbs of the slave lacerate its own spirit. Impelled by a quenchless love for man, it crosses oceans, climbs mountains, traverses continents, encounters dangers, faces death, for his redemption from oppression, and his elevation to freedom, intelligence, virtue, happiness, hope, and Heaven.

Such is Abolition. But some may say Abolition, thus explained, is an effect which we would indeed like to see accomplished—and, in this sense, we are Abolitionists; but we are opposed to Abolitionism—that is, to the means that are used to produce that effect.

I use the word Abolition, in this discussion, both in its popular sense, as descriptive of the present great movement in favor of emancipation, and, also, in its literal signification, as descriptive of the effect sought to be accomplished by that movement —leaving to those who hear me to give it a signification appropriate to the connection in which it is used. But what I say of Abolition, as an effect, I would substantially say of it as descriptive of the present great movement to produce that effect. By this, however, I do not intend to sanction every thing that is done by every body engaged in this movement. I have seen, and still see, many things to disapprove. But I regard them as spots in the sun, which, after all, gives a glorious light.

In approving of the present Abolition movement, I speak in reference of the principles that give it vitality, and the great agencies by which it is sought to give them efficacy—namely, freedom of speech and a free press—a freedom restrained by truth, and the spirit of the religion of Christ. Disapproving as I do of precipitate and ill-directed measures, and the indulgence of a harsh and bitter zeal in this cause, I feel, nevertheless, bound in sincerity to say that I had much rather see even this than to witness a continuance of the nation's death slumber over this great question. The first movements in the process of purifying the atmosphere are not unfrequently announced by "harsh thunder." But the thunder storm is nearly over—to be followed, I trust, by a steady and refreshing rain, which shall

*Since this speech was delivered, one of the Senators from Arkansas [Mr. SEVIER] has declared, in the Senate, that he would never vote for the admission of another free State into the Union, unless there should be a new slave State to balance it.

By what means does Abolition seek to accomplish its purposes? By the power of truth. Shaking not at the Goliah of slavery, it marches fearlessly to meet him. Trusting in the power of truth, and showing their respect for slaveholders by confidence in its practical efficacy, Abolitionists patiently and kindly, and perseveringly urge upon them its demands, and press them with its entreaties. I say kindly. Perhaps not always so. Better it were always—far better! But slavery is slavery! Not to feel, when the full import of that word enters their minds, would do no credit to their hearts, though it might secure for them the reputation of prudence, and save them from reproach.

By the power of truth, Abolitionists seek to create every where a public sentiment against slavery. They see the nation drugged with the opiates of wealth and pleasure, rioting in present abundance, and grasping after still greater; while the slave treads the same everlasting round of labor unrequited, and of toil unblest, his mind brooded in perpetual darkness, his crushed spirit feeling no elevated aspirations, and entering into none of the enjoyments suited to its noble nature and high destiny: while the nation, like the Priest and the Levite, have passed by, in cold, selfish indifference, leaving him to perish, without help and without hope. By patient and untiring efforts do Abolitionists seek to awake the people of this nation from their guilty slumber over the wrongs of slavery, and produce a conviction that the time has come when something should be done for its abolition.

To the extent of the constitutional power of Congress over this subject they ask its action. They pray it to abolish slavery and the slave trade in this District, over which it has exclusive jurisdiction, and to prohibit, as it clearly has a right to do, the slave trade between the States, and to admit no more slave States into the Union.

But their great, leading object is to create such a public sentiment in the South as shall effect the abolition of slavery in the slaveholding States by their own legislation. To do this, they labor, in the first place, to arouse the North to a consideration of this subject, to the end that it may speak out in clear and decided language its condemnation of slavery, and thus exert upon the South a strong moral influence in favor of its abolition—believing that the South will not pertinaciously refuse to yield to the calm and enlightened judgment of their brethren, especially when it is in accordance with the judgment of the great mass of the civilized world.

While speaking of the means by which Abolitionists aim to accomplish the abolition of slavery in the United States, I deem it proper to disabuse them of the charge of aiming to abolish slavery in the States by the legislation of Congress—a charge which is, I am informed, believed by many at the South to be well founded.

I hold in my hand "Jay's view of the action of the Federal Government in behalf of Slavery," a work published by the American Anti-Slavery Society, and, of course, expressing its views on the topics of which it treats. While I ask the attention of the House to that portion of the book which I am about to read, I take the occasion to commend the entire work to the attention of those who may be able to obtain it, as containing facts and views worthy the attention of all the members of this House, and all the people of this nation. The author says, (p. 216.)

"Every State possesses all the powers of independent sovereignty, except such as she has delegated to the Federal Government. All the powers not specified in the Constitution as delegated, are by that instrument reserved. Among the powers specified, that of abrogating the slave codes of the several States is not included. On the contrary, the guarantee of the continuance of the African slave trade for twenty years; the provision for the arrest of fugitive slaves; and the establishment of the Federal ratio of representation, all refer to and acknowledge the existence of slavery under State authority. If, therefore, the Abolitionists, unmindful of their solemn and repeated disclaimers of all power in Congress to legislate for the abolition of slavery in the States, should, with unexampled perfidy, attempt to bring about such legislation; and if Congress, regardless of their oaths, should ever be guilty of the consummate folly and wickedness of passing a law emancipating the slaves held under State authority, the Union would, most unquestionably, be rent in twain. The South would, indeed, be craven, could it submit to such profligate usurpation. It would be compelled to withdraw, not for the preservation of slavery alone, but for the protection of all its rights; and indeed the liberties of every State would be jeoparded under a Government which, spurning all constitutional restraints, should assume the omnipotence of the British Parliament. But it is scarcely worth while to anticipate the consequence of an act which can never be perpetrated so long as the people of the North retain an ordinary share of honesty and intelligence."

BRITISH ABOLITION.

And now, Mr. Speaker, let me show you the relation which this movement at the North, bears to Abolition elsewhere. Let me show you that it is but part of the great Abolition movement of this age—a movement in regard to whose principles and progress no American statesman ought to be, and no Southern statesman can be indifferent. Let me especially call your attention to British Abolition, which forms so prominent a part of it; and from whose origin, progress, and termination, both the North and the South may draw lessons of the deepest practical importance.

The British slave trade had existed for near two centuries, when David Hartley moved, in the House of Commons, in 1776, a resolution declaring "That the slave trade was contrary to the laws of God and the rights of man." It met the fate which a resolution, making the same affirmation of a similar trade carried on in sight of this Capitol, would probably now meet in this hall: it was promptly rejected.

In 1783, a petition against the trade was, for the first time, presented in the House of Commons. It met the fate which the petitions I have in my drawer before me will meet, if the rule I am opposing shall be adopted: its consideration was refused.

The Quakers, with whom these unsuccessful efforts originated, were not discouraged. On the 7th of July of that year, six of them met in London "to consider what steps they should take for the relief and liberation of the negro slaves in the West Indies, and for the discouragement of the slave trade on the coast of Africa."

What a sublime spectacle is here presented! Six men meeting together to devise means for waking the British nation from the guilty slumber of two hundred years! Six men conspiring to overturn a system of injustice and oppression which had received the sanction of ages, and which was fortified by the interests, the prejudices, and even the religion of the whole British empire! Nothing can exceed it in moral sublimity, but the going forth of twelve fishermen, at the command of the "Despised and Rejected," to assail an empire of Pagan idolatry and superstition which overshadowed the world.

And what was the principle, and what the spirit of this mighty enterprise? They were, the great truth which this nation had just triumphantly maintained in a seven years' war, and the benevolence which had sent forth to all nations the twelve disciples of the Christian faith, seventeen hundred and fifty years before.

Six Quakers! I cannot leave them. How prompt to yield to the "inward light!" How steady to the noble purpose it dictated! Well did Patrick Henry say, "I shall honor the Quakers for their noble efforts to abolish slavery." And who will not honor them for their patient, untiring devotion, both in Great Britain and in this country, in behalf of their oppressed brethren of the African race? How valuable the "testimony" they have uniformly borne against the great iniquity!

The six Quakers! Let none, henceforth, be disheartened in the cause of truth and righteousness, though few, and feeble, and despised. It was not by might, nor by wisdom, but by the power of truth, that these men went forward and verified the prediction that "one shall chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight." The six Quakers! Let us remember them, and be faithful to humanity, to justice, and to truth.

The six Quakers were soon joined by the same number of philanthropists of other Christian denominations. "The twelve" held meetings in London to devise means for revolutionizing the sentiment of an empire! Agents were appointed, among whom was the celebrated Clarkson, to rouse the public attention to the great subject. The pulpit and the press were enlisted. Books, pamphlets, and newspapers were freely circulated. Within a few years, petitions to Parliament were multiplied, insomuch that a commission was at length appointed by the Government to inquire into the African slave trade; and finally, on the 9th of May, 1788, the House of Commons voted that they would, at the next session, take the subject of that trade into consideration.

Without pursuing further the details of this matter, suffice it to say, that the ball thus put in motion continued to roll on, until the slave trade was abolished by act of Parliament in the year 1807.

But the great anti-slavery movement, begun by the six Quakers, did not end here. If it had thus terminated, it would have been, in the end, little less than a failure; for while slavery, the parent of the slave trade, is cherished, it will be in vain to attempt a complete suppression of its offspring. The great principle of opposition to the one can never be satisfied without the destruction of the other. This principle continued to operate with augmented power, and by various means, until the whole fabric of African slavery in the British dominions at length tumbled into ruins. The result is before us, even at our doors, in the full and complete emancipation of more than eight hundred thousand slaves in the British West India Islands, on the 1st of August, 1838.

I might recur to the early history of this great movement of British philanthropy, and show you with what bitterness and violence its projectors and supporters were assailed; and with what strange assurance slavery and the slave trade were defended by their advocates. But time will not permit. Suffice it to say, that the men who urged on the movement were denounced as "hypocrites and fanatics," and their project as visionary and delusive. It was declared in Parliament that it was "the intention of Providence, from the beginning, that one set of men should be slaves to another." The abolition of the trade, it was confidently predicted, would ruin the colonies, and fill them with massacre and blood; while the trade itself was actually vindicated on the ground of "its conformity with the principles of natural and revealed religion, as delineated in the Word of God!" "We had to contend," (says Clarkson, in his history of that struggle,) "and almost to degrade ourselves by doing so, against the double argument of the humanity and holiness of the trade!

And now, Mr. Speaker, can you consider the principles which lay at the foundation of that great movement—can you reflect upon their mighty moral power, and mark their triumphant results, and wonder at the existence of American Abolition? Wonder? Why, sir, would it not be among the greatest wonders of the world that the people of the United States should, with this history, and these results before them, have continued to sleep over American slavery?

FRENCH ABOLITION.

Sir, look at the influence which the British example has exerted upon other countries besides our own. Look, for example, at what is now going on in France. Abolition is engaging the attention of some of the greatest minds in the Empire. Societies are formed, and the subject is undergoing a thorough investigation. I have before me a summary of a report recently presented to the French Chamber of Deputies by M. de Tocqueville, in the name of the commission charged with examining the question of the abolition of slavery in the French dominions, which I beg permission to read. It is as follows:

"The report passes lightly and contemptuously over the argument in favor of slavery, and takes for granted the conviction in every mind that it ought to be done away with. It passes immediately to the vuestion of its being necessary to prepare the slave for emancipation previous to liberating him. M. Tocqueville, in the name of the commission, asserts that all attempts to improve, enlighten, and prepare the slave, as long as he is a slave, are impossible. The slave not only is ignorant of marriage—of the sacredness and morality of that tie—but incapable of being made to appreciate it, as long as he is a slave. There is antipathy between marriage and slavery—between slavery and the paternity which accompanies marriage. The slave's children are his equals, are independent of him, and excite no interest. None of the prudence and other virtues attending paternity accompany it in the slave. Christianity is equally incompatible with slavery—equally unintelligible. The minister of religion appears either as a support of the master's rule, and is thus abhorred, or he preaches the doctrine of Christian freedom, dangerous to the master. The commission, therefore, abandons the idea of preparing the slave for freedom by any regulations for his treatment whilst a slave. Emancipation, it adds, cannot be deferred."

Another summary which I have seen of this important report represents it as saying:

"The idea of emancipation is already present to the minds of all in the colonies. 'The approach of this great social change, the natural fears and the lawful hopes which it inspires, penetrate all bosoms, and produce deep agitation.' The recent events in the neighboring British islands have brought the idea of coming emancipation home to the planters."

The report concludes by proposing that, in the session of 1841, a law for the abolition of slavery shall be presented, determining the amount of indemnity which is to be saved to the state by means of the salary of the emancipated negroes—the labor of the latter to be secured by an express law.

Here is the effect which the principles of Abolition, illustrated and enforced by the British example, are producing in France.

PRESENT MOVEMENT A REVIVAL OF OUR EARLY ABOLITION, AND PART OF THE GREAT MOVEMENT OF CHRISTENDOM.

Do you still wonder at the feeling which exists at the North on this subject? Go back, for a moment, to the early history of Abolition in our own country. Consider the nature and extent of the anti-slavery feeling of the Revolution, and of the times succeeding it. Consider how wide, and deep, and strong was the current of this feeling when the Constitution was formed, and the present Government was organized; and then think how natural it is that the example of Great Britain, who has gone forward, in the very spirit of our own early Abolition, while we have gone backward, should shame our recreancy to our own principles, and make us haste to redeem ourselves from its reproach. How is it possible, with such associations crowding upon the national mind, that we should not catch some of the inspiration of the times when our fathers, looking up to Heaven for deliverance from oppression, thought of the slaves, and promised to deliver, as they themselves prayed to be delivered—of the times when Washington and Jefferson, Martin and Pinkney, Franklin and Jay, with a host of others, distinguished as statement, jurists, and divines, united in declaring slavery to be a violation of the "law of eternal justice," and a curse to the country.

Mr. Speaker, look yourself at all this, and tell me if you do not find your own spirit moved a little on this subject—if the fire of abolition does not begin to kindle even in your own bosom and its impulses begin to move your own generous heart. At least tell me if you can any longer wonder at the anti-slavery movements of the North; or if you can find it in your heart to denounce as "desperate and despicable fanatics" the men and women whose hearts, happily free in this respect from the prejudices of your own education, sympathize in the great movements of humanity in behalf of the African race, and feel the inspiration of the principles which have wrought out such happy results.

Sir, the present anti-slavery movement in this country is but part of the great movement of Christendom against slavery which has been going on for centuries, and especially for the last half century. Ever since Christianity emerged from the ages of oppression's dark and iron reign; raising her majestic form, and reaching forth her open hands with healing for the nations; has emancipation gone forth with protection for the weak, help for the helpless, and soothing for the heart of sorrow. Bending over the crushed and bleeding victims of oppression it has poured oil and wine into their wounds; given deliverance to the captives; opened the prison doors to them them that were bound; broken the fetters from the body; given freedom to the mind; and raised man to the true dignity and glory of his immortal nature. On her triumphant banner has been inscribed—Emancipation of Mind—Emancipation of Speech—Emancipation of the Press—Emancipation of Man.

PROGRESS OF EMANCIPATION ONWARD AND RESISTLESS.

And is it, sir, thought to impede the progress of emancipation by the puny efforts that are made here? Vain attempt! Can you hold the winds, stay the tides, or stop the course of universal nature? Then may you seal up the fountains of sympathy in the human soul, extinguish the sense of justice, and arrest the onward march of human emancipation. Stop emancipation! As well might the scoffers at Noah's ark-building have undertaken to shut the windows of Heaven, seal the fountains of the deep, or roll back the tide which drove them to the mountain tops as their last refuge from the rising flood.

There are some who, faithless to the efficacy of gag resolutions and gag rules, talk of a reception and commitment of the petitions, and a report thereon; which report is to put down abolitio for ever and ever! I recollect a remark I heard when a certain speech was made in a certain place—that that speech would put down abolition. Sir, you might as well attempt to blow out the sun as to put down abolition by a speech or a report.

Gag resolutions, gag rules, and "put down" speeches and reports, will be like putting down a walking stick in the Mississippi to stop its current. You think only of a rivulet, when there is a mighty stream. Turn your eyes to the Southeast. Behold the Gulf stream sweeping by your shores with its resistless and never-ceasing tide. Can you stop it? Try. Run out a pier of cork wood from Charleston. What is the result? The Gulf stream moves on! And there is an emblem of the stream of abolition which is rolling in upon the South from the British West Indies. Within a short time it will be swollen by the stream of French emancipation; and then, in the course of a few years, by that of Spanish emancipation.*

And then, sir, you do not think of the extent and power of abolition sentiment in our our country. Stop up the crater of a volcano, and soon the trembling, heaving earth reveals the mighty agency at work within! Sir, the human heart is full of abolition; and sooner or later it will come forth. There is that in slavery which seizes hold of the deepest sympathy of the human soul, and gives to it the most intense activity. It is not mere animal sympathy. It is not excited alone by accounts of bodily suffering; nor soothed into indifference by its mitigation. It is a sympathy with the nobler nature of the slave, crushed by the weight of slavery. It rejoices, indeed, to see him any where comfortably fed, and clothed, and housed; but it, nevertheless, sees him a slave!—his mind darkened, and his heart insensible to any higher emotions than the hopes and fears which are bounded by the narrow space of his earthly existence—an existence (I speak of slavery generally—there are exceptions) elevated to no practical purposes of duty to God and man above the brute that labors by his side. It sees, in short, his soul transfixed with the iron of slavery.

The feeling produced by the contemplation of all this is deep,

* Since the delivery of this speech, there has appeared the Bull of Pope Gregory XVI against the slave trade, dated at Rome, December 3, 1839. Its language shows very clearly that there is henceforth to be an influence from that quarter which will tell with tremendous effect against slavery—an influence that will enter the very heart of its dominions in Brazil, the Spanish West Indies and the United States.

and will be enduring. And, sir, it is to take possession of minds that have hitherto directed but little attention to this subject. It has now, indeed, a very deep hold on the minds of men who have connected themselves with no anti-slavery associations, and have manifested no forwardness in anti-slavery movements; men who may, perhaps, never join an anti-slavery society; but whose influence will, by and by, tell against slavery with great effect. Under the moderating influence of such men, Northern abolition is destined to settle down into a calm, steady, deep, and resistless current of abolition sentiment and feeling, which will make it more terrible to the South than an army with banners.

And then, sir, while abolition shall thus progress at the North, it will begin to be manifested elsewhere. Sir, before you are aware, it will make its appearance in the very heart of the South itself. Hitherto the anti-slavery feeling in that quarter (and there is a great deal of it there) has been absorbed by the scheme of colonization. The delusion that colonization can be made a complete remedy for the evil of slavery, by removing the whole of the slave population from the country, is to be dispelled, as involving an utter impossibility; and the opponents of slavery at the South are to be thrown upon the simple alternative of abolition or slavery—slavery with a fearful increase of numbers, and slavery without end!

When the Southern mind shall be brought to look that alternative full in the face, (and the sooner it is done the better,) then will "abolition" begin to make its appearance in the South. Indeed, sir, it is now there to a much greater extent than many are aware. And well it may be; for there has long been an abolition agent traversing the whole Southern country—an agent of surpassing ability and power—an agent who will soon give your Calhoun and Thompson something to do besides framing gag resolutions for these legislative halls, and constructing cob-houses for defence against the artillery of Northern abolition. Do you ask me the name of that agent? I will tell you. It is conscience; the most unyielding, uncompromising abolitionist the world ever saw. He has long lectured at the South with various success. He never fails to visit the bed of death, and there often speaks with great effect! He has lectured in England for the last half century with astonishing success; and is now at work in France, and is preparing to visit Spain and Portugal, and other countries in Europe and America. I warn my Southern brethren to look out for this Abolitionist—not for the purpose of catching and hanging him; for they can do neither; but to see him as he is; to measure his dimensions, to study his character; to respect his authority; and to yield to his power.

Such, sir, are the foes, external and internal, with which slavery has to contend. And is it thought to retreat from them by carrying out the threat to dissolve the Union? Sir, it would be like jumping into the crater of a volcano to escape its smoke and cinders. A dissolution of the Union to escape the influence of abolition! Why, sir, the moment you do this, there will be enlisted under the banner of the great anti-slavery agent now within your borders a thousand auxiliaries more powerful than all the Birneys and Blanchards, the Stewarts and Stantons in the land. A dissolution of this Union for the purpose of saving the institution of slavery! And that in the middle of the nineteenth century of the Christian era! Was ever infatuation like this? Would a dissolution of the Union shield the South from the power of abolition? Would it not, thenceforward, act with tenfold energy? Would not a severance of the Union instantly awaken throughout the whole South an oppressive sense of the evils of slavery! and a still more oppressive sensibility to the deep disapprobation of the civilized world? Sir, when the South shall be prepared to quit this fair land of promise and of hope, and launch upon the deep, in search of regions beyond the reach of civilized and Christian man, then, but not till then, let it talk of dissolving the Union to save the institution of domestic slavery.

DISPOSITION TOWARDS SLAVEHOLDERS—RESPONSIBILITIES OF PIOUS SLAVEHOLDERS.

In discussing this subject, I have spoken, as I felt bound to do, with great plainness, of the character, the encroachments, the deserts, and the doom of slavery. In doing this, I fear that, though intending to avoid harshness, I may have been unconsciously betrayed into it. With slaveholders I have no personal controversy. To them, as to all, I would be respectful and kind, while I am, as I must be, open and decided in my hostility to slavery. Of their motives in sustaining the institution of slavery, I have nothing to say. I am not constituted a judge of their hearts. There is One that judgeth. I assume no such office—standing here not to lecture on morals, but to speak of human rights. Nor would I indulge in any sneers, invectives, or anathemas. They are as foreign to my feelings as they are to the proprieties of the place and the occasion. Let those who choose, wield such weapons. My business is to reason, not to rail; to entreat, not to denounce. For the slaves I have pity; for their masters no other than feelings of kindness and good will. They are alike my brethren; and I would no sooner insult the feelings of the one than I would apply the lash to the backs of the other.

Among slaveholders there are men of great personal worth. I see such around me. But I must be permitted to say to them, and to all that stand in this relation, that they know not what they do. They avoid, doubtless, what are called the cruelties of slavery, and are regarded as kind masters. But do they reflect that they, and such as they, constitute the very pillars of slavery?—that the whole system, with its admitted cruelties and undeniable outrages on human rights, would fall, if good and pious men were to withdraw from it their countenance and support? That such would be the effect is undeniable. How much longer they can, under the increasing light of the rising day, continue their present relation to the institution, or whether any longer, I will not take upon me to say. But I do say that there are responsibilities connected with a continuance of this relation, which have something to do with the consequences of that relation; something to do with the enormity of the system of which it forms a part, and which they are endeavoring to clothe with the sacred garb of Christian principle. The truth is the whole system of slavery is wrong, incurably wrong. Pious slaveholders avoid that they deem oppression and cruelty, without reflecting that, in its mildest forms, slavery contains the great essential element of all oppression and cruelty—namely, injustice.

EXPEDIENCY AND JUSTICE.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, I beg permission to consider briefly an objection which is urged against granting the prayer of the petitions which the contemplated rule would reject, drawn from consideration of expediency. Admitting, says the objector, that Congress have the power to abolish slavery and the slave-trade here, yet it is inexpedient to do it.

Mr. Speaker, this is a question of justice. Let me illustrate. I take a man's horse and put him in my stable as my property. Justice comes and says, open that stable door and send that horse to his owner. But the law has authorized me to take him. For indebtedness? asks justice. No. Then let the door be opened at once; and let the law be repealed without delay. Who will say that expediency may resist that order?

But let us vary the case. Instead of taking the man's horse, I take the man himself, claim him as my property, drive him to my fields and compel him to labor without compensation. Justice meets me and says: Lay down that whip and cease to claim that man as property. But the law has authorized me thus to claim and use him. No matter for that, I say, let him go; and to the law makers I say, repeal your law immediately. Would not expediency blush to be seen countermanding either of these orders?

Take another case. There is a man riding through Pennsylvania Avenue, and there are fifty men in chains marching before him. What is he doing with them? Driving them to market! Justice comes along and asks, by what authority are you doing this? By authority of the laws of the United States, is the answer. Have these men committed crimes? asks justice. No, is the reply. Then knock off those chains instantly: But the nation has authorized me to chain and drive these men, and I shall do it; cease your impertinence. And what next do we see? Why, sir, Justice turns from the scene of horror, and, lifting up his trumpet voice, says to the nation, cease this injustice; command that these victims of oppression be restored to freedom; command it immediately. Stay, cries the slave-driver, it is inexpedient—Inexpedient! inexpedient, exclaims justice, break these chains and let them not, for another moment, bind the limbs that God Almighty made for freedom.

Who, sir, will dare stand up, and, in the name of expediency, resist this command? None but those whose minds have never grasped the great idea of justice; who have never considered the nature and authority of its claims upon human obedience. Justice! How deep and comprehensive its meaning! How inflexible its decisions! How inexorable its demands! How watchful is its guardianship of human rights! How deep does it lie in the foundation of our civil institutions! The English common law, the inheritance and the blessing of our country, rests upon it. It gives stability to our State Constitutions; and here it is, the very "corner-stone" of the Federal Constitution. "To establish justice!" How properly does this stand out in bold relief, among the assigned purposes of its adoption; and with singular appropriateness was it made to precede and stand in immediate connection with another great purpose, namely, "to ensure domestic tranquillity," forming, in fact, the true and only basis on which that tranquillity can rest.

Justice! sir, it is the noblest attribute of the Almighty—immutable as his own nature, and firm and enduring as his everlasting throne—high as Heaven, deep as Hell, and broad and boundless as the universe. Justice! Let that word be engraved on the pillars that surround these halls of legislation, and upon the walls of the Executive mansion; let it blaze from the dome of every capitol in the Union; let it be written in stars on the expanse of the American heavens; and let it be deeply furrowed with the ploughshare of truth upon the broad face of our country, from ocean to ocean.

But I am asked—with all your veneration for justice, would you now vote to abolish slavery and the slave-trade in the District of Columbia? Is not "public opinion throughout the Union against it?" And is it not "utterly impracticable?" That may be, though I think the public opinion is less opposed to it than the objector imagines. But it is not impracticable for me to vote for it; or, at least, to declare that I will do so, if I can have an opportuntiy. Possibly my vote might stand alone, though I do not deem that quite certain. But the vindication of many a right has had as small a beginning as this. None that I ever heard of was vindicated by beginning with the declaration that nothing could be done, and, in accordance with it, doing nothing. Whoever here believes that justice demands the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade in this District, let him say so by his vote. If he begins alone, he will not long remain so. How small was the beginning of Abolition in the British Parliament?—small, I mean, in numbers and immediate influence, through great—transcendently great—in the man who first moved the measure. It was WILBERFORCE—possessing a soul as large in its benevolence as the universe, and a mind that grasped the mighty subject in the profound depth of its great principles, and in its vast bearings on the destinies of the race whose rights he vindicated, and to whose deliverance from oppression he devoted for his life. WILBERFORCE! A name I feel unworthy to pronounce, and which I never can pronounce but with the deepest veneration for his meek and gentle, though dauntless courage and noble bearing in that great cause.

When Wilberforce moved, for the first of ten times he did move, the abolition of the slave trade, he was denounced, even by name, on the floor of the House of Commons, as a "hypocrite and lunatic;" but that did not move him. Planting himself on the rock of truth and justice, he stood unappalled by the magnitude and threatening aspect of the system of injustice which he assailed. And think you he would have been less earnest and less persevering in that cause, if, instead of a trade in slaves between Africa and the West Indies, the trade had been between London and Liverpool, as it is here between Washington and New Orleans?

It is said, I know, that the abolition of slavery here is but a small matter. It is, however, small only in comparison with the great work, which is to be done in the States beyond the reach of our legislation. Nothing is small, in an absolute sense, that involves a question of justice. Justice listens as attentively to the claim of one man for the rights that God has given him as to the clamors of a thousand. Here, with in our exclusive jurisdiction, are men who claim justice at our hands; and shall we refuse it? Can we refuse it? So far as my humble voice can go, it shall not be refused for a day or an hour.

But if a majority of this House are not ready now to vote for the abolition of slavery here, will they not vote for the abolition of the slave trade? That the public mind is not prepared for this, is what I will not admit, until I am forced to do it by something more conclusive than "dough face" predictions that it will dissolve the Union. Sir, it is a foul libel on this nation to say that it is not prepared to abolish the slave trade here. If it is not, then, in the name of consistency, I say, let it repeal its laws against the foreign slave trade, and permit the dealers in human flesh to disgorge their cargoes of living death upon the shores of the Republic.

You will perceive, Mr. Speaker, that I make the demands of justice imperative. We are so constantly in the habit of consulting expediency, and very properly, too, in the ordinary affairs of life, that we are prone to forget the peculiar character of the claims of justice. We are often afraid to do justice, because of supposed consequences. Nothing can be more false in ethics than this. We should "be just and fear not." "What doth the Lord thy God require of thee, but to deal justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God." There is no individual or nation under heaven upon whom the obligation of this requirement does not rest with perpetual, unmitigated force. Are we to oppose our short sighted apprehensions of danger to the demands of justice? Do we believe in the authority of the giver of this law of justice and mercy, and that the world is governed, not by blind chance, but by his unerring Providence, and shall we not trust to Him to take care of the consequences of a compliance with his own commands?

But if our faith is not satisfied with reasoning a priori, shall we not be convinced by the reasoning from facts? What nation or individual ever suffered from doing justice? Take, for example, the cases of emancipation. Although they have often been preceded by gloomy predictions of evil, of massacre and blood, yet what single page of history has recorded their fulfilment? St. Domingo has often been cited as an exception. But if it were an exception, it would prove the rule. It is not, however, an exception, as I could easily show if I had time—the massacre and blood having resulted from the cruel attempt of Bonaparte to force the emancipated back to bondage—an attempt which they nobly and triumphantly resisted.

But even if St. Domingo were an exception, it would prove nothing to the objector's purpose, since emancipation there was in the midst of a revolution in the mother country, distinguished, as all know, by cruelty and blood, and by an entire absence of all religious restraints. All who know any thing of the history, especially of modern emancipation, know that it lives and moves and has its being in the benign and peaceful spirit of the Christian religion—a spirit that acts at once on the emancipators and the emancipated. Let those who are filled with apprehensions of evil from emancipation, consider that, henceforth, more perhaps than at any time heretofore, is Christian principle to become the master spirit of Abolition, exerting its hallowing influence upon both the white and black races, giving a healthful and wise direction to the measures of the one, and chastening the feelings, elevation the purposes and ennobling the awakened energies of the other.

EMANCIPATION, IMMEDIATE AND SIMULTANEOUS.

But, I am asked, must emancipation be immediate? Is it not necessary to prepare the slave for freedom? Experience has shown that one of the most important preparations for freedom is freedom itself—that a state of slavery is utterly incompatible with preparation for the enjoyment of freedom. Thus the operation of West India emancipation has been found more favorable in those islands where the emancipation was immediate, as in Antigua and the Bermudas, than in those where the system of apprenticeship was adopted. Those concerned in the present movement of Abolition in France have, it seems, fully considered this subject, and have come to the conclusion, as in the report of M. de Tocqueville to the Chamber of Deputies, to which I have referred, that immediate, is preferable to any form of gradual emancipation.

The truth is, that the need of preparation is on the part of the free, rather than the enslaved. By this I mean that the success or failure of all attempts at emancipation must depend upon the promptness and freeness of the act—having reference to the effect upon the feelings of the emancipated—and the kind and paternal legislation which shall be afterwards adapted to their peculiar situation; legislation which shall bring to bear, systematically, upon their roused energies and quickened intellects the conservative influences of a pure religion and an uncontaminated literature.

And, sir, shall not all this be done? Can it be withholden? Is it not a debt long, long due to this unfortunate and oppressed race? Has not their degradation been the work of slavery? And for whom have they labored? Whose fields have been moistened by the sweat of their brows? Whose tables have been spread with the fruits of their toil?

There are many who are strongly wedded to the old but soon-to-be-exploded system of emancipation upon what is called the post nati principle—that is, emancipation which takes effect only on the after born. No system can possibly be worse than this. It leaves the training of the free children in the hands of slave mothers; and brings into perpetual contact the free and the enslaved, each to exert the worst possible influence on the other. To this cause, with the cruel neglect of legislation provision for the education of the emancipated, is to be traced the degradation of the free black population in the slave States, as well as in those States—Pennsylvania, for example—in which emancipation has been effected on the principle just mentioned.

The true system is, to emancipate all at once—to make the act of justice appear like one of noble generosity—and thus—as has been seen in the West Indies—excite a common feeling of gratitude in the emancipated, and rouse them to common and simultaneous effort, and emulation, in the march of improvement. Who can fully estimate the results of removing the crushing weight of slavery, and leaving the common mind of an emancipated race to find its way, by the aid of wise and beneficent legislation, onward and upward in the march of intellectual and moral improvement.

EFFECT OF ABOLITION IN THE SOUTH.

Impressed, as I am, with a conviction of the decided advantage of immediate and simultaneous, over gradual emancipation, I cannot doubt that when the South shall come to emancipate, as they will one day do, they will nobly strike for immediate and simultaneous emancipation. There is a promptness and generosity in the Southern character which is a sure guarantee of this. I know it is said that Abolition has thrown back emancipation half a century. There is one kind of emancipation that Abolition has thrown back; and that is, gradual emancipation, with colonization as a remedy for slavery. In doing this, it has done a great service to the cause of genuine emancipation, because it has prepared the way for the adoption of a system founded on true principles. It is drawing the patient from a pernicious and deceptive reliance on an inadequate prescription, to the true and only remedy.

It is said that the North had better be quiet on this subject, for that the South will not listen even to truth coming from that quarter. Sir, this suggestion involves an imputation upon the intelligence and love of truth of the South, too dishonoring to be endured for a moment. There is a momentary feeling there, I know, which seems to justify the assumption. But it will not be enduring. The involuntary homage of the human soul to truth, checked for a moment by a feeling of independence—a noble impulse, rightly directed—will yet break out in the South, and, overcoming the pride of opinion, the prejudices of education, and the misdirected feeling of independence, will produce results that will astonish the world. The struggle may be long, but the triumph of truth will one day crown it. I may not live to see that day; but as surely as the wheels of time roll on, so certainly will that triumph come to bless my country.

"MY POSITION" DEFINED.

Mr. Speaker, I have finished what I intended to say on the subject before the House. Before taking my seat, however, I must beg its indulgence to permit me to follow the example of others, by "defining my position."

The decided ground I have taken on the subject of slavery may have led some to doubt whether I should not abandon my political associates, and withhold my support from their candidate for the Presidency. I take this occasion to say that nothing can be further from my intention than this. Before the meeting of the Harrisburg Convention, I publicly expressed my determination to support the nominee of that Convention, whoever he might be of the Whig candidates then before the country. And I am happy to say that a selection has been made of one who, to his firm support of genuine Democratic Whig principles, adds personal qualities which very much endear him to me, and greatly heighten the claim which his political principles give him to my confidence and support.

If I am asked what are General Harrison's present views on the subject of Abolition, my reply is, that I do not know. I do know, however, that they cannot be worse than those of his competitor; and I am willing to assume, for the present purpose, that they are no better—with, however, this difference, touching his own course, that he would not, as I trust, embody in his first official act a pledge, in advance, that he would exercise the veto power, either on this, or any other specific subject. I think he will have the decency to wait for the proper occasion, and then honestly and intelligently deliberate upon the exercise of the power, in any case that may be presented to him. If I were a Southern man, I would spurn any proffer of aid to sustain slavery made for mere political effect, and in flagrant disregard of sound principle, as well as of the proprieties of the high station of Chief Magistrate of the country. I should never deem the interest I desired to protect safe in such hands.

In supporting General Harrison, I place Abolition entirely out of the question. Not that I do not regard it as a subject of very great importance; and, indeed, as I have shown, a subject of great political importance. But it is not, and cannot be, the great practical question for the decision of the country at the approaching Presidential election. The public mind is not prepared to have an Abolition candidate for the Presidency; nor to have an Abolition President. I cannot act in obedience to blind impulse. I must see that some good is to be attained. What possible good can come to Abolition, or to any other interest, by now bringing this question into the Presidential election? I have never been able to see any; I cannot now see any. On the contrary it seems to me the cause of Abolition would be deeply injured by it.

Abolition is eminently a moral and religious enterprise. It owes its existence to Christianity. Its triumphs have been emphatically the triumphs of Christian principles. Emancipation would not, in truth, be safe without their conservative influence. That influence is now eminently conspicious in producing the auspicious results of emancipation witnessed in the West Indies.

The first step, then, in the great reform, must be in the church. Little progress, can be made in enlightening and purifying public sentiment on this question, while the church—"the pillar and ground of the truth"—remains insensible to the power of truth. Here is a great, and, I am sorry to say, a difficult, work to be performed. The darkness which has long hung over the American church, on the subject of slavery, has been like the darkness of Egypt. It must be dispelled, as it has been in Great Britain. The obligations of the Christian religion must be seen and felt to be obligations which know no distinction of color. The church must no longer ask, with unfeeling indifference—"Who is my neighbor?"

And then the moral feeling of the whole community is to be awakened. The true nature of the slave relation is to be investigated. The question—by what authority are men made slaves? is to be considered—not put aside for the next generation to consider. Men who hold slaves, and men who advocate the right to hold them, and men who refuse to bear testimony against holding them, are to be made to feel that they are all acting under responsibilities to the God of the slave—to Him who has made all of one blood, and who has connected rights and duties with this relation of brotherhood.

Here is the foundation work of Abolition. It is a great work. It should be well begun. A spirit of kindness and good-will should strongly characterize every step in the progress of it, and stand out in strong contrast with the harshness and severity of ordinary party contests. No whip of scorpions should be wielded—much as there is in slavery to excite the feelings—but truth should have, in her advocates, a spirit and temper corresponding with her kind and beneficent offices, and her pure and exalted nature. And patience, too, must have its perfect work. The rough and stubborn fallow ground is not to be broken up and the good seed planted in a day. Nor can it be expected to spring up and bear fruit in a day. There are difficulties to be encountered, peculiar to our own country; not difficulties to discourage, but to inspire caution, prudence, firmness, and a steady hold upon the great principles which lie at the foundation of the cause. Customary political expedients—the expedients of a corrupt and corrupting state of politics—must be avoided; and there must be exhibited a singleness and purity of purpose which shall commend the cause and its advocates to public confidence. Abolition must not be suspected of a design to obtain power for the sake of power. Its advocates must have no ambition but the ambition of doing good. A man who is aspiring to office as his chief good, has yet to learn the first lesson in the school of Abolition.

The work of Abolition is but begun in this country. The cause is in its infancy. It cannot start up in a day to manhood, as Minerva sprang forth, full armed, from the brain of Jupiter. Truth "will prevail" if it can have the aid of time. It never yet achieved a victory without it; certainly not the victory of reforming a community.

It is thus that the great work is to be carried forward to its consummation; thus that the streams of benevolence are to be thrown into a right direction, and a sound and healthful public sentiment formed on the subject of slavery—a sentiment elevated by high intelligence, and purified by the pervading influence of Christian principles. Nothing can exert a more healthful influence on the public mind and heart than the agitation of the question of Abolition, under the guidance of these principles. It will purify the fountains of national thought and feeling, carry us back to the better days of the Republic, cherish in us their noble self sacrificing spirit, and elevate us on to the board platform whereon our fathers were gathered when they declared, in the face of earth and Heaven, that "all men are created equal."

You will thus perceive, sir, that I place moral Abolition in the front, and that I would have political Abolition move in the rear. This will not, I know, suit the impatience of many very excellent men, who think that Abolition will not thus advance with the desirable rapidity. But it will, in my judgment, advance more surely to a safe result.

I do not say that Abolition is, even now, to be utterly excluded from the field of political action. It will of necessity, by degrees, enter it. It cannot be kept out. Of the circumstances which will justify such action, Abolitionists in the various sections of the country, will of course judge, from considerations which cannot control in deciding the question of bringing out an Abolition candidate for the Presidency. Abolition has not strength to bear such a contest. Its infancy must not be rocked in the whirlwind of a Presidential election.

When and as fast as the public sentiment shall have become purified and elevated by the discussions of human rights and obligations, necessarily connected with the progress of Abolition, there will be raised up, by a natural, unforced process, as vegetation springs forth under the genial influences of rain and sunshine, men fitted for the political duties which Abolition is destined to perform.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that in thus avowing my determination in regard to the Presidency, I subject myself to the censure of "sacrificing my principles of liberty." This is the language which has already been applied to me for the vote I gave for you as presiding officer of this body; and I expect it will be repeated, in reference to my present avowal. There are those who do not perceive, what seems to me a very plain distinction between sacrificing principles, and failing to do precisely all to advance them which some of their advocates deem necessary. They seem not to understand that a good cause may be injured as well by overdoing as by the opposite. I regard the question of anti-slavery, in its principles and bearings, as the greatest question that agitates the world. But I cannot forget—for the history of all reforms admonishes me—that time is essential to success in the great contest which freedom is waging against oppression.

The principles on which this cause rests are as immutable as truth and justice; but the means of giving to them efficacy are various. If I were a slaveholder, I would not withhold justice from my slaves for an hour. I could not. If the laws prohibited me from emancipating them, I would, imitating the noble Alabamian who spent almost his last dollar to get his slaves to Indiana, leave the State which had sought to bind me by such unrighteous and cruel enactments, and seek one where the doing of justice would not be contrary to law! This is a case in which there should be no delay. Justice says—now. But, in taking measures to induce my neighbor who does not see the matter as I do to do justice, I may not be able to make it the work of a day, or a month, or a year. His movements are not subject to my volitions; and while, in my own case, considerations of expediency, as it is usually understood, are to be disregarded; in the other, I am not only at liberty, but may feel most strongly bound to exercise the wisdom that dwells with prudence, that so I may more speedily and effectually gain my brother.

I thus speak in reference, primarily, to the efforts of the North to persuade the South to undertake, in earnest, the work of emancipation; which efforts, it should never be forgotten, constitute the great work of Northern Abolition. But what I have said involves a principal bearing upon the question of political action. I have heard it maintained that it was as wrong to vote, in any case, for a slaveholder, as to hold slaves. There might be truth in this, in a case in which my vote, withheld from him and given to an apponent of slavery, might, without injuriously affecting some other great and vital interest, have a decidedly favorable influence on the cause of Abolition. And this is precisely the question which presented itself to me upon the late election of Speaker; and which presents itself now, in reference to the election of President and Vice President. How is Abolition to be benefited by my withdrawing from the great contest now about to be decided between power and popular rights, and giving my vote for Mr. Scattering, or not voting at all?

Mr. Speaker though feeling deeply on the subject of slavery, and ardently desiring its Abolition, I do not stand here exclusively devoted to that interest. There are other great interests to be attended to in this nation besides that of Abolition; and I should be false to the trust reposed in me were I to thrust them aside as unworthy of regard; especially in the CRITICAL CRISIS through which they are now passing.

And what is this crisis? It is the point of extremity in a great struggle which has been going on for ten years—a struggle involving some of the most essential principles of the Constitution. It is now to be decided whether the people are to be permitted the free use of their intelligent, uncontrolled suffrages to make the Congress and the President, and thus govern themselves, or whether the President shall use the vast patronage of the Government to corrupt its officers—deceive the people—make both branches of Congress—strengthen his abused power, and perpetrate it in the hands of his chosen successor; whether, in fact, we are to have a Government of Executive influence or a Government of laws—a constitutional Government of three branches, or an unconstitutional Government of one; a question, in short, between Executive power on one side, and liberty and the Constitution on the other.

Such is the question. By a long course of insidious usurpation has the Constitution been practically changed. Shall the change be ratified and confirmed by the popular voice? Thus involving the country in the mischief of the change itself, and the pernicious consequences of a popular sanction of the usurpation and corruption which produced it? This is the question to be decided.

If the powers now actually exercised by the Executive had been embodied in an article headed "The President shall have power," and proposed to the Convention of '87 as a part of the Constitution, who believes that it would have obtained a single vote in that body? Or if it had been proposed by the first Congress as an amendment to the Constitution, would it have received a single vote in a single State in this Union? Nobody will venture to say that it would. And yet, now, the very same question is involved in the question of continuing in power an Administration which has used, and is still using, the corruption of its own usurpations to gain from them the popular sanction, and thus give them, to all practical purposes, the force and effect of constitutional law.

It suits the purposes of some, however, to represent the great question now in contest as one of "mere dollars and cents"—banks and currency—safe or unsafe keeping of the public moneys; and in that light to be altogether unworthy of a comparison with the question of human rights involved in the cause of Abolition. Now, sir, though as a mere question of currency it is a question of immense importance in its vast and complicated bearings upon some of the highest interests of the people, yet, the question of power—of a practical change of the Constitution by encroachment and popular acquiescence, I regard as of incomparably more importance. And so does the Administration! For all the rash experiments which have struck, as with a paralysis, the industry and prosperity of the country, have been undertaken, and persevered in, for the sake of power! for the sake of doing, in effect, just what I have asserted is really being done—changing, practically, the Government and Constitution of the country, by concentrating all power in the hands of one man. And such, sir, is now the great purpose of the Administration in its persevering efforts to carry the so-often-rejected Sub-Treasury scheme, by an exertion of Executive influence equal to any which has ever signalized the most corrupt periods of British history.

There are, I know, Abolitionists who are deeply convinced of the existing abuses and corruptions; but who, nevertheless, say that it is vain to attempt a reform by efforts to overthrow the Administration; that the only way to accomplish it is to abandon the present Opposition, and rely on an ultimate triumph of Abolition to purify all the parties, and restore the Constitution. This, Mr. Speaker, seems to me very much like abandoning all commonly approved remedies for a disease, and giving up the patient to die, in reliance upon a restoration to health by a resurrection from the dead. It betrays an utter insensibility to the real effect of sanctioning the usurpations of which I have spoken, by re-electing to the Presidency their chief author—an effect which involves not only a practical change of the Constitution—the final mischiefs of which nobody can calculate—but such a wide diffusion of the leaven of corruption, and such a consolidation of the power which has introduced it, as to place the country well nigh beyond the reach of remedy. Where is the Whig Abolitionist who is willing to give up, and leave this leaven to act, and this power to gain strength, in the hope of ultimately saving the country by Abolition? I have great confidence in the purifying power of Abolition principles, but I cannot be so blind as not to see that corruption may, in the unprecedented activity of its leavening process, reach the very remedy which is relied on to effect its cure!

I have thus given, summarily, my views of the question and the crisis. And now, sir, I am not, at the moment of such a crisis, when the true friends of popular rights are buckling on their armor for a death-struggle with corruption, to lay down my arms and retreat from the battle-field. I am not, when the knife is drawn to sever the monster which has, for ten years, been winding itself around the country, now to give up, and say—let him wind his last fold, and crush the last bone! No, sir; no! I shall help to fight out this battle, if Heaven spares me.

And now, sir, where is the man around whom we may rally?—the man whose name shall be to us a strong tower—the man who is to lead us to victory. There is, thank Heaven, such a man! His name is wafted to us on the winds that sweep the Alleghanies, and comes back in thundering echoes from the Atlantic shores. The West, the East, the North, the South, unite to proclaim William Henry Harrison as the man.

And who is William Henry Harrison? Sir, he is the noble son of a noble sire, whose name stands next to that of Thomas Jefferson on the Declaration of Independence. A man who has shown that he received the instructions of such a father not in vain; a man who drew in, with his first breath, the pure inspiration of Revolutionary principles, and who has, through a long and eminently useful life, exhibited those principles in the well-proportioned developments of a patriot and a man. Yes, sir, a man! Not a shrewd, cunning, plotting, scheming, selfish heartless politician, but a man—a man with a heart—a heart as big as a world—a heart unpractised in political guile, or in any guile—a heart whose warm pulsations were never checked by the chill of selfishness—a heart open, kind, generous, uncorrupted and incorruptible. Sir, this is no fancy sketch. It is sober truth, written on every page of Harrison's history—the history of a soldier, a scholar, a statesman, a philanthropist, and an honest man.

Do you ask whether he understands the crisis, and is capable of giving to his principles and efforts a direction suited to it? Yes, sir, precisely. His vigorous mind has struck, with remarkable discrimination, upon the true points of reform demanded by the crisis for which he has been raised up. Hear him. In a letter on the 2d of December, 1838, to the Hon. Harmar Denny of Pennsylvania, he says:

"Among the principles proper to be adopted by any Executive sincerely desirous to restore the Administration to its original simplicity and purity, I deem the following to be of prominent importance:

"I. To confine his service to a single term.

"II. To disclaim all rights of control over the public treasure, with the exception of such part of it as may be appropriated by law to carry on the public service; and that to be applied precisely as the law may direct, and drawn from the Treasury agreeably to the long established forms of that Department.

"III. That he never should attempt to influence the elections, either by the people or the State Legislatures; nor suffer the Federal officers under his control, to take any other part in them than by giving their own votes, when they posses the right of voting.

"IV. That, in the exercise of the veto power, he should limit his rejection of bills to, 1st. Such as are, in his opinion, unconstitutional; 2d. Such as tend to encroach on the rights of the States or individuals; 3d. Such as, involving deep interests, may, in his opinion, require more mature deliberations, or reference to the will of the people, to be ascertained at the succeeding elections.

"V. That he should never suffer the influence of his office to be used for purposes of a purely party character.

"VI. That, in removals from office of those who hold their appointments during the pleasure of the Executive, the cause of such removal should be stated, if requested, to the Senate at the time the nomination of a successor is made.

"And last, but not least in importance,

"VII. That he should not suffer the Executive Department of the Government to become the source of legislation; but leave the whole business of making laws for the Union to the Department to which the Constitution has exclusively assigned it, until they have assumed that perfected shape where, and where alone, the opinions of the Executive may be heard."

I have no time, Mr. Speaker, to comment on this exposition of the principles which are to be brought into General Harrison's Administration. They need, however, no commentary. They commend themselves, at once, to universal acceptance, and their author to the regard and confidence of the country, and the whole country—a regard and confidence which are daily gaining strength, and which are destined, I trust, to give a strength to the Administration of this great and good man which no Administration since the days of Washington has possessed.

Such is the man! And such a man the country wants at this great crisis, to rescue it from the hands of misrule and corruption. General Harrison is emphatically one of the people. He comes forth from the midst of them, wearied with the toils, and covered with the sweat, of his noble occupation. He comes, at their call, to administer their Government for their benefit! He comes with a hold on their affection and confidence rarely enjoyed by any public man—a confidence which the history of his life shows he will never abuse—a confidence which will enable him to do an amount of good that few statesmen, in the short space of four years, have ever been able to accomplish. Mr. Speaker, I will not say that it would be "sufficient glory to serve under such a chief," for that is a language becoming no freeman to use; but I will say that it would be a glorious privilege to witness such a reform as the noble veteran is destined to accomplish; and to breathe the healthful and invigorating atmosphere of his pure, upright, impartial, and just Administration.
